Tlakom (Tlā'qôm). A Squawmish village community on Anvil id., in Howse sl., Brit. Col.—Hill-Tout in Rep. Brit. A. A. S., 474, 1900.

Tlakstak (Lī'qst'ar). A former Chinookan village on the s. side of Columbia r., Wash. It was occupied by the people who afterward settled Wakanasisi, q. v. (F. B.)

Tlalegak (Lī'lgak, 'eddy'). A former Chinook (Wahkiakum) town near Pillar Rock, Columbia r., Oreg. (F. B.)

Tlanak (Lanark). A Tlingit town in the Sitka country, Alaska. (J. R. S.)

Tlanusi (Tlanusi'yi, 'leech place'). An important Cherokee settlement at the junction of Hiwassee and Valley rs., the present site of Murphy, in Cherokee co., N. C. (J. M.)

Glennuse.—Bartram, Travels, 371, 1792. Klansuna.—Mooney in 19th Rep. B. A. E., 535, 1900. Quanuse.—Bartram, op. cit. (perhaps synonymous, although in the same list as the above). Quoneashee.—Mooney, op. cit. (quoted). Tlanusi'yt.—Mooney, op. cit. (correct Cherokee form).

Tlascopsel. According to the royal cédula of Apr. 16, 1748 (Archivo Gen. de Méx., R. Céd., LXVIII, MS.), providing for the establishment of three missions on San Xavier (San Gabriel) r., Texas, this was one of the tribes which previously asked for a mission there. They have not been identified and probably are known in history by some other name. In discussing the cédula referred to, a contemporary who evidently had lived in Texas wrote: "The Lacopseles, which later are called Tlacopseles, besides being very strange (extraño) to me, are likewise unknown to the Asinay or Texa language, for it is well known that their alphabet does not contain l, which occurs twice in each name." He concludes, therefore, that the name must have been reported in the Yadocxa (Deadose, which was that of the Bidai and Arkokisa) language (MS., ca. 1748, in the archives of the College of Guadalupe de Zacatecas, Mexico). (H. E. B.)

Lacopseles.—Bonilla, Breve Comp. (1772), trans. by West in Tex. Hist. Quar., VIII, 46, 1904. Tlascopsel.—Morfi, Mem. Hist. Tex., bk. II, ca. 1782, MS.

Tlasenuesath (Tla'senüesath). A sept of the Seshart, a Nootka tribe.—Boas in 6th Rep. N. W. Tribes Can., 32, 1890.

Tlastlemank (Tlastlemang, 'saltwater creek'). A Squawmish village community in Burrard inlet, Brit. Col.—Hill-Tout in Rep. Brit. A. A. S., 475, 1900.

Tlastshini ('red flat'). A Navaho clan. Tlastcini.—Matthews in Jour. Am. Folk-lore, III, 103, 1890. Tlastsini.—Matthews, Navaho Legends, 30, 1897.

Tlatek. A Chnagmiut Eskimo village on the N. bank of Yukon r., Alaska, 35 m. above Andreafski.

Tlatek.—Baker, Geog. Dict. Alaska, 1902. Tlatekamat.—Post-route map, 1903. Tlatekamute.—Raymond in Sen. Ex. Doc. 12, 42d Cong., 1st sess., 25, 1871 (referring to the inhabitants).

Tlathenkotin ('people of the river that trails through the grass'). A division of the Tsilkotin living in Tlothenka village on Chilkotin r., near Fraser r., Brit. Col. Pop. 190 in 1892, besides 35 in the independent village of Stella.

Tlā-theñ-koh'-tin.—Morice in Trans. Can. Inst., IV, 23, 1893.

Tlatlasikoala (La'Lasigoala, 'those on the ocean'). A Kwakiutl tribe which formerly lived at the N. E. end of Vancouver id., but later moved to Hope id. Its gentes, according to Boas, are Gyigyilkam, Lalaulela, and Gyeksem. This tribe and the Nakomgilisala are known to the whites collectively as the Nawiti (q. v.). Within recent years they have always lived together. In 1906 their combined population was 69. (J. R. S.)

Tlatlelamin (La'Le'amin, 'the supporters'). A gens of the Ninkish, a Kwakiutl tribe.—Boas in Rep. U. S. Nat. Mus. 1895, 331, 1897.

Tlataskanai. An Athapascan tribe that formerly owned the prairies bordering Chehalis r., Wash., at the mouth of Skookumchuck r., but, on the failure of game, left the country, crossed the Columbia, and occupied the mountains on Clatskanie r., Columbia co., Oreg. (Gibbs in Cont. N. A. Ethnol., I, 171, 1877). "This tribe was, at the first settlement of the Hudson's Bay Company in Oregon, so warlike and formidable that the company's men dared not pass their possessions along the river in less numbers than 60 armed men, and then often at considerable loss of life and always at great hazard. The Indians were in the habit of exacting tribute from all the neighboring tribes who passed in the river, and disputed the right of any persons to pass them except upon these conditions" (Dart in Ex. Doc. 39, 32d Cong., 1st sess., 6, 1852). In 1851 the tribe was reduced to 3 men and 5 women, and since then has become extinct.

A'latakne-i.—Gatschet, Kalapuya MS., B. A. E., 72. Athlaxni.—Ibid. (Kalapuya name). Clackstar.—Lewis (1806) in Orig. Jour. Geog. Soc., 229, 1887 (misprint).

Tlayacma.—A former village connected with San Francisco Solano mission, Cal.—Bancroft, Hist. Cal., II, 506, 1886.

Tldulditamai (Ld'ldji tamā'-i, 'Mountain-woman's children'). A subdivision of the Djiguaahl-lanas, a great Haida family of the Eagle clan. It has long been extinct.—Swanton, Cont. Haida, 273, 1905.

Tleatlum (Tle'atlum). A Squawmish village community on Burrard inlet, Brit. Col.—Hill-Tout in Rep. Brit. A. A. S., 475, 1900.

Tlegonkhotana. A division of the Kaiyuhkhotana living on Tlegon r., Alaska, consisting of the villages Innoka, Tlegoshitno, and Talitui.

Tljegonchotana.—Zagoskin, Reise, 324, 1849. Tlegon Khotana.—Petroff, Alaska, 37, 1884.

Tlegoshitno. A Kaiyuhkhotana village on Shageluk r., Alaska.

Tlégogitno.—Zagoskin in Nouv. Ann. Voy., 5th s., XXI, map, 1850. Tlegoshitno.—Petroff, Rep. on Alaska, 37, 1884. Tlegozhitno.—Zagoskin, Descr. Russ. Poss. Am., map, 1842.

Tlegulak ('buoys.'—Boas). A former

Igu'laq.—Boas, Kathlamet Texts, 182, 1901.

Tlekem (l̥'q'Em). A gens of the Walas Kwakiutl, a sept of the true Kwakiutl. Boas in Rep. U. S. Nat. Mus. 1895, 330, 1897.

Tlelding. A former Athapaskan village on Trinity r., just below the mouth of South fork, Cal. Its inhabitants spoke the language of the Hupa, from whom they differed in no respect except slightly in religion and in their political relations. Just above this village, which is now deserted, are the pits of many houses marking the site of a settlement which the natives believe to have been occupied by the Kihunai before the coming of Indians. The largest pit is pointed out as the location of Yimantuwingyai's house when he was chief of the immortal Kihunai at Tlelding. The Southfork Indians, as they are commonly called, came into violent conflict with military forces in the fifties and were removed to Hupa valley at the establishment of the reservation. The few surviving families now live near their old home (P. E. G.)

A-hel-tah.—Gibbs in Schoolcraft, Ind. Tribes, III, 139, 1853. Kailtas.—Powers in Overland Mo., IX, 162, 1872. Kel'-ta. Powers in Cont. N. A. Doc. 4, 32d Cong., spec. sess., 194, 1863. Ta-hail-ta.—Meyer, Nach dem Sacramento, 282, 1866.

Tlenedi. The principal social group among the Auk tribe of Alaska. It belongs to the Raven phratry.

Ll̥n̥'ed̥i. Swanton, field notes, B. A. E., 1904. tl̥n̥'ed̥i.—Krause, Tlingit Ind., 116, 1885.

Tlesko. A Tleskotin village on Chilcotin r. near its junction with Fraser r., Brit. Col.—Morice in Trans. Roy. Soc. Can., sec. II, 109, map, 1892.

Tleskotin ('people of the Splint river'). A division of the Tsilkotin living in the village of Tlesko (q. v.); pop. 75 in 1892. Tles-koh'-tin.—Morice, Notes on W. Dénés, 23, 1893.

Tletlket (l̥'q'et, 'having a great name'). A gens of the Walas Kwakiutl and another of the Tlaautsis.

l̥'q'et. Boas in Rep. U. S. Nat. Mus. 1895, 330, 1897. l̥'q'et̥.—Ibid. Tl̥q̥'et̥i.—Boas in Petermanns Mitteil. pt. 5, 131, 1887.

Tlingus (l̥'q̥'ūcāñ, 'flat slope'). A Haida town of the Kagiala-kegawai family, formerly on Louise id., Queen Charlotte ids., Brit. Col.—Swanton, Cont. Haida, 279, 1905.

Tlialil. A former Koyukukhotana village on Koyukuk r., Alaska; it contained 27 people and 3 houses in 1844.

Tlialil-kakat. Zagoskin quoted by Petroff in 10th Census, Alaska, pt. 5, 1884.

Tliktlakotin (l̥q̥'la'q̥'tin, 'ferry,' 'crossing place'). A Ntlakyapamuk village on the E. side of Fraser r., 3 m. below Cisco, Brit. Col.; so named because the Indians were accustomed to cross the river in their canoes here.—Teit in Mem. Am. Mus. Nat. Hist., II, 169, 1900.

Tlikutath (l̥'q̥'kutath). A sept of the Opitchesah, a Nootka tribe.—Boas in 6th Rep. N. W. Tribes Can., 32, 1890.

Tlingit (l̥'q̥'it, 'people'). The usual name for those peoples constituting the Koluschan linguistic family. They inhabit the islands and coast of N. W. America from about lat. 54° 40' to 60°, or from the mouth of Portland canal on the S. (except the E. and S. part of Prince of Wales id., occupied by the Kaigani, or Alaskan Haida) to Chilkat on Controller bay, their last permanent settlement, just beyond which they meet the Eskimo as well as the Ahtena, an Athapaskan tribe.

Anthropometric investigations seem to indicate that, from a physical point of view, the Tlingit (Koluschan), Tsimshian (Chimmesyan), and Haida (Skittagetan) should be grouped together, and by the similarity of their social organization and languages the Haida and the Tlingit are associated still more closely.

Tlingit tradition points to the Tsimshian coast as their original home. In 1741 Chirikoff and Bering reached the Tlingit coast, and during the next half century Russian, Spanish, English, French, and American explorers and traders were frequent visitors. In 1799 a fort was built near where Sitka now stands, but in 1802 the Sitka Indians rose, killed part of the inmates, and drove away the remainder. In 1804 Baranoff attacked the natives in their fort, finally driving them out, and then established a post there which grew into Sitka, the capital of Russian America. Russian rule, especially under Baranoff, was of the harshest character (see Russian influence), and there was constant trouble between the warlike Tlingit and their masters. In 1867 the tribes were transferred, with Alaska, to the jurisdiction of the United States.

The Indians of this group looked to the sea for their main livelihood, and depended on land hunting to a less extent, though for natural reasons more than did the Haida. Shellfish and various roots also constituted not a small part of their diet. Seals, otters, and porpoises were important objects of pursuit. The Tagish of Lewis r., who are supposed to be Tlingit, live like the Athapaskan tribes, which they resemble in all respects except language. The Tlingit display much mechanical skill, especially in canoe-building, carving, the working of stone and copper, blanket and basket making, etc. The practice of slavery, so common on the N. W. coast, was much in vogue among them, and formerly they made distant expeditions for the purpose of obtaining slaves.

Though dialectic differences exist in the Tlingit language, they are comparatively slight, and the active intercourse maintained by the several divisions under the incentive of trade has doubtless been instrumental to some extent in producing the marked homogeneity in character and customs that everywhere prevail. At the same time the speech of Yakutat diverges somewhat from that of the towns farther s., and between the northern and the southern towns in the remaining territory there is a certain amount of variation.

According to Veniaminoff these Indians in 1835 numbered about 5,850. In 1839 an enumeration of the Tlingit and Kaigani was made under the direction of Sir James Douglas and showed, exclusive of the Yakutat, Sitka, and Tagish, 5,455 Tlingit. A census compiled in 1861 by Lieut. Wehrman, of the Russian navy, gave 8,597 Tlingit, including 828 slaves. The figures given by Petroff (10th Census, Alaska, 31-32, 1884) are 6,763, and those of the Eleventh Census, excluding the Ugalakmiut, which are improperly counted with them, 4,583. It would appear that the Tlingit population has been declining steadily during the last 70 years, but there is evidence that this decline has ceased.

Most of the Tlingit tribes deserve to be called rather geographical groups. They are the following: Auk, Chilkat, Henya, Huna, Hutsnuwu, Kake, Kuiu, Sanyakoan, Sitka, Stikine, Sumdum, Tagish, Taku, Tongas, and Yakutat or Hlahayik. Emmons adds two others, the Gunaho (see Gonaho) and Guthleuh of Controller bay. The Kajechedi is a Tlingit division that has not been identified.

Socially they are divided, like the Haida, into 2 phratries, Yehl (Raven), and Goch (Wolf) or Chak (Eagle), each of which (again like the Haida) is subdivided into consanguineal bands or clans. These are:

Yehl.—Ankakehittan, Deshuhittan, Ganahadi, Hlukahadi, Kahlchanedi, Kashkekoan, Kaskakoedi, Kachadi, Katkaayi, Kiksadi, Koskedi, Kuhinedi, Kuyedi, Nushekaayi, Sakutenedi, Tahlkoedi, Takdentan, Takwanedi, Tanedi, Tenedi, Tihittan, Tlenedi, Tluknahadi.

Goch or Chak.—Chukanedi, Daktlawedi, Hehlqoan, Hlkoayedi, Hokedi, Kagwan-tan, Kakos-hittan, Katagwadi, Kayashkidetan, Kokhittan, Nanyaayi, Nastedi, Nesadi, Shunkukedi, Siknahadi, Sitkoedi, Takestina, Tekoedi, Tluukoedi, Tsaguedi, Tsatenyedi, Was-hinedi, Wushketan, Yenyedi.

Outside of either clan.—Nehadi.

The Tlingit towns, both occupied and abandoned, are: Akvetskoe, Angun, Anchguhsu, Chilkat, Chilkoot, Chitklin's Village, Dahet, Deshu, Dyea, Gash, Gaudekan, Gonaho, Gutheni, Hlahayik, Hlukkukoan, Hukanuwu, Kahlchatlan, Kake, Katchanaak, Katkwaahltu, Katlany's Village, Keshkunuwu, Klawak, Klughuggue, Klukwan, Kona, Kuiu, Kukanuwu, Kustahekdaan, Ledyanoprolivskoe(?), Nahltushkan, Shakan, Sikanasankian, Sitka, Skagway, Sumdum, Takokakaan, Tlistee, Tluhashaiyikan, Tluhashakian, Tongas, Tsantikibin, Tuxican, Yakutat, and Yendestake.

For the synonymy of the stock, see Koluschan Family. (H. W. H. J. R. S.)

Tlukoedi (L'ū'q'oedi, 'white people'). Said to be the name of an old Tlingit family belonging to the Wolf phratry, now almost extinct. They were named from the white color of water. (J. R. S.)

Tlulashakian (L'ucā'cak'i-ān, 'town on top of a sand hill'). An old town on the n. side of the w. entrance to Cross sd., Alaska. It is in the Huna country, but is said to have been occupied anciently by many families of the Wolf phratry, since scattered all over the Alaskan coast. It is perhaps identical with Klug-hugue. (J. R. S.)

Tluskez (the name refers to a carp-like fish). A Ntshaautin village on a small lake tributary to Blackwater r., Brit. Col. It is probably the village where Mackenzie (Voy., 299, 1801) was hospitably received on his journey to the Pacific, whose inhabitants he found more cleanly, healthy, and agreeable in appearance than any that he had passed.

Toag. See Togue.

Toalli. A district, probably in s. w. Georgia, visited by De Soto, Mar. 23, 1540. The houses are described by the Gentleman of Elvas (Bourne, Narr. of De Soto, I, 52, 1904) as having been roofed with cane after the fashion of tile; some with the sides of clay (plastered?), and kept very clean.

Otoa.—Biedma (1544) in French, Hist. Coll. La., II, 100, 1850. Toalli.—Gentl. of Elvas, op. cit.

Toanche (Teandeuñata, 'one enters by it'). A Huron village situated at different times at several points on and adjoining Thunder bay, Ontario, and bearing several names. It was a port of entry of the Huron Bear tribe, hence its name. Before 1635 it had been twice destroyed by fire. Through fear of French revenge for the killing of Brulé at this place, it was abandoned in 1633, and a new village, Ihonatiria, was established by a part of its inhabitants, while the remainder went to Ouenrio. Tobacco. On the arrival of the first Europeans in North America the natives were observed to make offerings of the smoke of some plant, generally believed to be tobacco, to their many deities and spirits; by it disease was treated, and the smoke ascending from the pipe was regarded as an evidence of such an act as the sealing of an agreement or the binding of a treaty. Tobacco was likewise offered in propitiation of angry waters, to allay destructive winds, and to protect the traveler. Oviedo (Hist. de las Indias, i, 130, 1851) says that the Indians of Hayti in the 16th century "had the custom of taking fumigations for the purpose of getting intoxicated (which they call tabaco) with the smoke of a certain herb." Ernst (Am. Anthr., ii, 133, 1889) states that Oviedo is certainly right in giving the name (strictly taboca, a word of Guarani origin) to a Y-shaped inhaler still used by several South American tribes for the absorption of certain powders (niopo, parica). Columbus, on Oct. 15, 1492, met a man in a canoe going from Santa Maria to Fernandina, the second and third of the Bahama ids. that he touched, who was carrying dry leaves which he thought must be appreciated among the Indians because they had brought him some at San Salvador. Las Casas (Hist. Gen. de las Indias, cap. 46, 1875-76) says that messengers whom Columbus sent ashore in Cuba found "men with half-burned wood in their hands and certain herbs to take their smokes, which are some dry herbs put in a certain leaf, also dry, like those the boys make on the day of the Passover of the Holy Ghost; and having lighted one part of it, by the other they suck, absorb, or receive that smoke inside with the breath, by which they become benumbed and almost drunk, and so it is said they do not feel fatigue. These, muskets as we will call them, they call tabacos. I knew Spaniards on this island of Española who were accustomed to take it, and being reprimanded for it, by telling them it was a vice, they replied they were unable to cease using it. I do not know what relish or benefit they found in it." Navarrete says: "Such is the origin of our cigars" (Thatcher, Columbus, i, 561, 1903). These authors are among the first to refer to tobacco, the use of which spread rapidly over the world. Benzoni (Hist. New World, Hakluyt. Soc. Pub., 80, 1857) in 1541-56 tells how slaves brought to America from Ethiopia by the Spaniards preserved the leaves of a plant that grows in these new countries, which was picked in its season, tied up in bundles, and suspended by them near their fireplaces until dry; to use them they take a leaf of their grain (maize), and one of the other plant being put in it, they roll them tight together. So much, he says, "do they fill themselves with this cruel smoke that they lose their reason" and "fall down as if they were dead, and remain the greater part of the day or night stupefied," though others "are content with imbibing only enough of this smoke to make them giddy, and no more." This author says that in Mexico the name of the herb itself was tobacco.

There is some question as to the uses to which tobacco was put in the West Indies, in South America, and in parts of southern Central America. In all of these sections there were names for the plant itself, and in most of these regions cigars or cigarettes were in common use, but the tobacco pipe appears to have been unknown until recent times. In 1540 Hernando Alarcon (Ternaux-Compans, Voy., ix, 322, 1838) described the natives on the lower Rio Colorado as carrying "small reed tubes for making perfumes, as do the Indian tabagos of New Spain."

Nicolas Monardes (De Simplicibus Medicamentis, 1574) called the plant "tobacco," as did other authors of the period. It was credited with wonderful properties, curing not only disease but wounds. It was extolled as an intoxicant and as a preventive of hunger and thirst, and was said to invigorate the weary and to ward off disease. The Mexicans called the plant yell, the Peruvians sayri. Harriot (Narr. of Va., repr. 1893) said in 1585: "There is an herbe which is sowed a part by it selfe, & is called by the inhabitants Vppowoc: In the West Indies it hath diuers names, according to the seuerall places & countries where it groweth and is vsed. The Spaniards generally call it Tobacco. The leaues thereof being dried and brought into powder: they vse to take the fume or smoke thereof by sucking it through pipes made of claie into their stomacke and heade; from whence in purgeth superfluous fleame & other grosse humors, openeth all the pores & passages of the body: by which meanes the vse thereof not only preserueth the body from obstructions; but also if any be, so that they haue not beene of too long continuance, in short time breaketh them: wherby their bodies are notably preserued in health, know not many greeuous diseases wherewithall wee in England are oftentimes afflicted."

The word tobacco is of American origin, and has been adopted, with slight variation, into most foreign languages to designate the plant now smoked throughout the world, although there is evidence that the early Spanish settlers employed the word to designate the instrument in which the plant was smoked, rather than the plant itself. In early French narratives of Canada the word petun is almost always used. This term is of Tupi origin and is still found among the dialects of that language in Brazil under the forms pety, petim, petun, petin, pitima, petume, petemma, etc., whereas the word "tobacco" appears to be traceable to the Carib word taue, tawe, touica, tamoui, etc., and the Chibcha dua, dura, dawa, etc., the differences being merely dialectic. The word sic, si'c, zig, sic'al, etc., is often employed by the Maya of Yucatan to designate the cigar, although this people has other words for tobacco, as mai and kutz. In all the Indian languages of North and South America words are found to designate the tobacco plant, and in the languages of the northern tribes especially there are commonly two words for tobacco, probably referring to different varieties of Nicotiana.

Nadaillac says that the tobacco plant was introduced into Europe by the Spaniards as early as 1518. Diego Columbus, in his will dated May 2, 1523, made a legacy to a tobacco merchant of Lisbon, showing how rapidly traffic in the new panacea sprang up. Jean Nicot, French ambassador to the King of Portugal, sent seeds of the plant to Catherine de Medici about 1559, a service commemorated by the name Nicotiana given to the plant. As many as 40 varieties of the tobacco plant have been noted by botanists. It was called by the French "herbe de la reine" and "herbe sainte"; by the Dutch "the ambassador's plant"; the Spaniards called it "yerba sancta" because of its wonderful virtue in treating disease, which Oviedo (Purchas, Pilgrimage, v, 957, 1626) said "was not only for sanity but for sanctity also." The Portuguese called it "erbasanta croce." Sir Francis Drake referred to tobah as early as 1578, and was the first to take Virginia tobacco (Nicotiana tabacum) to Europe, according to Fairholt. The cigarette has been smoked in the S. W. from time immemorial, and the sacred cigarette deposited by priests in caves as a votive offering, thousands being found in cave shrines in Arizona.

The practice of making cane cigarettes survived up to a recent period among the Pima of Arizona, who, before going to war against the Apache, made from a reed growing along the Rio Gila a smoking tube the length of the first two joints of the index finger, around the middle of which was tied a miniature belt woven from cotton and agave fiber, with fringed ends, and called a blanket, this clothed reed being regarded as male or female according to certain marks upon it. Before the departure of a war party these tubes were charged with tobacco and smoked toward the cardinal points, to the fetishes, and to all the objects that were to be used in the campaign, each warrior smoking his own tube. At the close of the ceremony the tubes were deposited as offerings in shrines dedicated to the War god, which were generally in caves. Fewkes in 1907 found in one of six ceremonial rooms excavated by him at Casa Grande, Ariz., hundreds of these tubes in the fireplaces. Their surfaces were charred, but they were still distinguishable. Large numbers of similar tubes were found by Cushing in ceremonial caves in the Gila and Salt r. valleys.

In South America tobacco appears to have been used chiefly in the form of snuff. There is some evidence that the plant was chewed in Central America. The Indians of North America generally are said to have cultivated tobacco from a very early period, several varieties of which were known to them. The Tionontati, because they grew the plant in commercial quantities, were called by the French Nation de Petun.

Tobacco was cultivated in most tribes by the men alone, and was usually smoked by them only; among the Iroquois and some of the Pueblos trade tobacco was not smoked in solemn ceremonies. At times both priests and laymen smoked plants or compounds that were strongly narcotic, those using them becoming ecstatic and seeing visions. To the Indian the tobacco plant had a sacred character; it was almost invariably used on solemn occasions, accompanied by suitable invocations to their deities. It was ceremonially used to aid in disease or distress, to ward off danger, to bring good fortune, to generally assist one in need, and to allay fear. The planting of medicine tobacco is one of the oldest ceremonies of the Crows, consisting, among other observances, of a solemn march, a foot race among the young men, the planting of seed, the building of a hedge of green branches around the seed bed, a visit to the sweat house, followed by a bath and a solemn smoke, all ending with a feast; when ripe, the plant was stored away, and seeds were put in a deerskin pouch and kept for another planting (Simms in Am. Anthr., vi, 331, 1904). The Mandan and Arikara, among others, are known to have cultivated tobacco from very early time, while the Siksika, essentially a hunting tribe, cultivated tobacco, according to Grinnell, as their only crop. The tobacco plant was carefully dried by the Indians and kept as free from moisture as possible; that intended for immediate use was kept in bags of deerskin or birch bark, skins of small animals, or baskets neatly woven of roots and grasses. The bags were often elaborately decorated by the women.

Of the family Solanaceae few species were used as narcotics. Cornus sericea and C. stolonifera grow over the greater part of North America and are used for smoking nearly as extensively as Nicotiana. Matthews thinks that red willow has been mistaken for these by several authors. Kinnikinnick, an Algonquian word signifying '(what is) mixed by hand,' is used to designate a mixture of tobacco with some other plant, either for the purpose of imparting a more pleasant odor or to reduce its strength, as the trade tobacco alone is commonly too strong to suit the fancy of the Indian. Among the western tribes tobacco was ordinarily used by mixing with it gum, sumac, and bearberry, the bark, leaves, and roots of two kinds of willow, manzanita leaves, Jamestown weed, touchwood, dogwood bark, arrowwood, and a variety of other woods, barks, leaves, twigs, and even insects. The plant was commonly used throughout Europe as an antidote against the plague and other diseases. Its cultivation, to the exclusion of other vegetal products, brought the colonies of Virginia and Maryland on more than one occasion to the verge of starvation. Statistics show that in 1908 the product of tobacco in the United States amounted to 718,061,380 pounds. The value of manufactured tobacco for the year 1900 was $283,076,546.

Tobagan. See Toboggan.

Tobhipangge (T'o B'hi-päng-ge). A former Tewa village 8 m. N. E. of the present Nambe pueblo, N. Mex. The Nambe people assert that it was reared, occupied, and abandoned by their ancestors prior to the Spanish advent in the 16th century.—Bandelier in Arch. Inst. Papers, iv, 84, 1892.

Tobique. A band of Malecite living on a reserve consisting of 14,800 acres of forest and farming lands at the junction of Tobique and St John rs., Victoria co., New Brunswick. They numbered 157 in 1910, and are Roman Catholics. They gain a livelihood by hunting, by serving as guides and lumbermen, and as laborers for the residents of Perth and Andover; they also sell their native wares, such as snowshoes, axe-handles, baskets, and barrel-staves, and farm to some extent.

Tobic.—Vetromile, Abnakis, 122, 1866. Tobique.—Shea, Cath. Miss., 157, 1855.

Toboggan. A sort of sledge in use among the Algonquian Indians of N. E. North America, and adopted from them, with the name, by the whites. The toboggan is made of thin, narrow boards, 10 or 12 ft long, bent over and lashed at the end and covered with rawhide. Those intended to be drawn by dogs are much larger than those now used for sliding down hills in sport. The word, which has been spelled in English in a variety of ways, as turbogan, tobogan, and toboggan, which is the usual form in English Canada, came into the language from Canadian French, in which the word is old, occurring as tabaganne in Leclercq (Nouv. Rel. de la Gaspésie, 70, 1691). In French Canadian the word appears in divers forms, as tabagane, tabogine, tobagan, tobogan, etc., some of them influenced by English spellings. According to Gerard (inf'n, 1908) "the word is from Abnaki udábá'gán, meaning '(what is) used for dragging,' from udábá'ge, 'he uses for dragging,' from udá'be, 'he drags, or hauls, with a cord.' The name was that of an Indian drug made of the skin of a deer. A sleigh or drag made of wood or branches was designated as udábáuäsk, a name which, after the introduction of wheeled vehicles, was applied to a wagon or a carriage." See Sleds.

A probable variant of toboggan is Tom Pung, which has been also reduced to pung (q. v). The adoption of the use of the toboggan by the whites of parts of Canada and the United States as a winter sport has given rise to derivative words, as the verb toboggan, tobogganer, tobogganist. A sport known as "water tobogganing" was introduced by Paul Boynton. (A. F. C.)

Tocane. A Chumashan village between Goleta and Pt Concepcion, Cal., in 1542.

Tocane.—Cabrillo, Narr. (1542), in Smith, Colec. Doc. Fla., 183, 1857. Tolane.—Taylor in Cal. Farmer, Apr. 17, 1863.

Tocas. A former tribe of N. E. Mexico or S. Texas, probably Coahuiltecan, who were gathered into mission San Buena-ventura de las Cuatro Ciénegas, in Coahuila.—Orozco y Berra, Geog., 302, 1864.

Tocaste. A village entered by De Soto in 1539, shortly before reaching Cale (Olagale), and probably about the upper Withlacoochee r., S. from the present Ocala, Fla. (J. M.)

Tocaste.—Gentl. of Elvas (1557) in Bourne, De Soto Narr., i, 36, 1904, Ranjel (ca. 1546), ibid., ii, 65, 1904.

Tocax. A place, apparently in the Cherokee country, visited by Juan Pardo in 1566. It may possibly have some connection with Toxaway, or Tagwahi (q. v.).—Mooney in 14th Rep. B. A. E., 535, 1900.

Tocholimafia. The Golden Warbler clan of Tase pueblo, N. Mex.

Tócholimafia tarina.—M. C. Stevenson, notes B. A. E., 1910.

Tochotno. A former Kuliethana village on Kuskokwim r., Alaska: pop. 9 in 1844.—Zagoskin quoted by Petroff in 10th Census, Alaska, 37, 1884.

Tocia. A Chinamashan tribe, one of several formerly occupying the country from Buena Vista and Carises lakes and Kern r. to the Sierra Nevada and Coast range, Cal. By treaty of June 10, 1851, these tribes, which had been reduced through conflict with the Spaniards and with neighboring Indians, reserved a tract between Tejon pass and Kern r., and ceded the remainder of their lands to the United States. See Barbour in Sen. Ex. Doc. 4, 32d Cong., spec. sess., 256, 1853.

Tockaawgh, Tockahow, Tockwock, Tockwogh. See Tockahoe.

Tocobaga. A tribe, apparently of Timucuan affinity, holding in the 16th century a considerable territory along the w. coast of Florida northward from Tampa bay and perhaps including the region of Withlacoochee r. The Paracoxi, Hurripacuxi, etc., of the De Soto narratives, mentioned as the name of the chief or province, seem to be properly the title of the chief, signifying, respectively, 'chief' and 'war chief' in the Timucua language (Gatschet). Later in the century, when the Spaniards began to establish posts and missions, the tribe was uniformly called Tocobaga. They were at war with their southern neighbors, the Calusa, until peace was made through the efforts of Menéndez about 1570. Like the other ancient tribes of Florida, they probably dwindled to final extinction from the inroads of invading Seminole. (J. M.)

Toctoethla. A former Seminole town, settled by 40 or 50 warriors from Kanchati; situated w. of Chattahoochee r., 10 m. above Flint r. junction, in Jackson co., Fla.—Bell in Morse, Rep. to Sec. War, 307, 1822.

Tocwogh (corruption of Ptukneu, contracted to tukneu and pronounced tuk'-no. See Tuckahoe.—Gerard). A former tribe on Chester r. on the E. shore of Maryland. In 1608 Smith estimated them at 100 warriors; they were then allies of the Conestoga. Their principal village, of the same name, was on the s. bank of the river, about 7 m. from its mouth, in Queen Anne co. Brinton identifies them with the Nanticoke, although Smith mentions the two as distinct tribes.

Tockwagha.—Schoolcraft, Ind. Toggle. See Fishing, Hunting.

Togiagamiut. An Eskimo tribe inhabiting the country about Togiak bay and adjacent lakes, Alaska. They are primitive in their habits, but excellent hunters. Women dress in the feathered skins of swans, geese, and cranes. The villages are Ekilik, Imiak, Kashaiak, Kassianak, Kulukak, Togiak, Tuniakpuk, Ualik.

Togiak. A Togiagamiut village at the mouth of Togiak r., Alaska: pop. 276 in 1880, 94 in 1890.

Togiagamiut.—11th Census, Alaska, 164, 1893 (the people). Togiagamute.—Petroff, Rep. on Alaska, 48, 1881. Tugiak.—Tebenkof (1849) quoted by Baker, Geog. Dict. Alaska, 1902. Tugiatak.—Sarkis, 1826, quoted by Baker, ibid.

Togiak. A trading station on the E. shore of Togiak bay, Alaska: pop. 28 in 1880, 14 in 1890.

Togiak Station.—Petroff in 10th Census, Alaska, 17, 1884.

Taghiaratzoriamute.—Petroff, Rep. on Alaska, 53, 1880. Togiarhasoriamute.—Hallock in Nat. Geog. Mag., IX, 88, 1898.

Togue. A name applied in Maine to the species of lake-trout known in some other parts of the country as namaycush. The form toug is also in use, and the spelling togue would indicate a derivation through Canadian French from Micmac or Passamaquoddy. According to Livingston Stone (Rep. U. S. Comm. Fish, 1872-73, 220), the togue is the great gray-trout (Salmo trutta) found in New Brunswick and Maine, and called in L. Temiscouata, tuladi. The precise origin of the word seems not to be known. (A. F. C.)

Togwingani (To-gwing'-a-ni). A Paviotso tribe living about Malheur lake, E. Oreg., in 1881. "Captain Egan" was its chief, and the tribe has usually been called Snakes.—Powell, Paviotso MS., B. A. E., 1881.

Tohaha. A subtribe, apparently Tonkawan, living in the latter part of the 17th century near the Colorado r., on the line of travel from San Antonio to E. Texas. They were closely associated with but distinct from the Toho, and also closely allied with the Emet and Cavas. What seems to be the first mention of them was made in 1683 by Juan Sabeata, Mendoza's guide to central Texas. He included them and the Emet (Emati) in the list of tribes said by him to live 3 days E. of the lower Rio Grande. La Salle heard of the Tohaha in 1687 before crossing the Colorado. They were probably identical with the Teao, through whose village La Salle passed a short distance E. of the same river. This conclusion is based on the fact, aside from the similarity of names and associates, that in 1689 and 1690 Massanet, from personal knowledge, three times reported the Tohaha (whom he called Toaa, or Toao) as living in the very vicinity where La Salle had so shortly before visited the Teao.

By a process of elimination, supplemented by some positive data, it may be inferred that the Tohaha were probably Tonkawan. In 1691 Massanet enumerated the Toaa, Tojo, Emet, Cavas, and Sana in a list of tribes living E. of Arroyo del Cibolo and speaking a non-Coahuiltecan language. According to Joutel the Teao spoke a language different from that of the Ceniz (Hasinai). If the Toyal mentioned by Belleisle (1719-21) were the Tohaha, as seems not unlikely, his account would indicate that they were not allied with the coast tribes, and therefore were probably not Karankawan. Moreover, there is some positive evidence that the Sana (q. v.), at least, were of Tonkawan affiliation. While the Tohaha seem not to be mentioned after Belleisle's account, assuming their identity with the Toyal, the Toho and their other associates continue to be mentioned for sometime. (H. E. B.)

Teao.—Joutel (1637) in Margry, Déc., III, 298, 1878. Toaa.—Massanet (1689) in Tex. Hist. Asso. Tohaktivi (To-hak-ti-vi). A Paviotso tribe formerly about the White mts., near the head of Owens r., E. Cal.—Powell, Paviotso MS., B. A. E., 1881.

Tohlka (T'ō'lk'a). A Haida town of the Tohlka-gitunai family, formerly on the N. coast of Graham id., just W. of the entrance to Masset inlet, Brit. Col.—Swanton, Cont. Haida, 281, 1905.

Tohlka-gitunai (T'ō'lk'a gitānā'-i, 'the Gituns of Tohlka'). A Haida family of the Eagle clan, named from its town, Tohlka (q. v.). They formed one family with the Widja-gitunai, Chets-gitunai, and Djus-hade. (J. R. S.)

Tohnokalong. A Yukonikhotana village on the N. bank of Yukon r., lon. 54° 25'.

Toho. A subtribe, apparently Tonkawan, closely associated with but distinct from the Tohaha. In the latter part of the 17th century they lived on Colorado r., Texas. For their location, probable linguistic affiliation, and early mention, see Tohaha. While the Tohaha disappear after 1721, at the latest, the Toho, in later times more commonly called Tou or Tuu, and their associates, the Emet and Cavas (Caguas), continue to be known. About 1740 and thereafter they entered San Antonio de Valero mission in considerable numbers, and were there as late as 1765. In addition to the authorities cited below, consult the manuscript mission records of San Antonio de Valero. The names Tuu and Tou suggest Tups and Tops (q. v.), names of a tribe apparently Karankawan. (H. E. B.)

Atayos.—Cabeza de Vaca (1584), Smith trans., 121, 1871. Atoyos.—Davis, Span. Conq. N. Mex., 82, 1869 (misprint). Tayos.—Cabeza de Vaca as quoted by Barcia, Ensayo, 13, 1723 (these three forms probably refer to the Toho rather than to the Adai). Thoo.—Massanet (1690) in Dictamen Fiscal, Nov. 30, 1716, MS. Tohan.—Joutel, Jour., Eng. ed., 90, 1719. Tohau.—Joutel in Margry, Déc., III, 288, 1878. Toho.—Talon (1698), ibid., 612. Tokau.—Joutel, Jour., Eng. ed., 115, 1719. Too.—Massanet (1689), MS. Toxo.—Joutel quoted in Tex. Tohol. Mentioned as a pueblo of the province of Atripuy (q. v.) in the region of the lower Rio Grande, N. Mex., in 1598.—Oñate (1598) in Doc. Inéd., XVI, 115, 1871.

Tohome. A former Muskogean tribe of the Gulf coast, speaking a dialect of Choctaw (Margry, Déc., IV, 427, 514-31, 1880). Their cabins stood 8 leagues N. of the French settlement at Mobile, on the W. side of Mobile r. The number of warriors was estimated in 1702 at 350. They were allies of the French and had been baptized in the Roman Catholic faith.

Tohookatokie. Mentioned together with Wichita, Caddo, Biloxi, Alabama, Delawares, Shawnee, Creeks, Choctaw, Chickasaw, Quapaw, and a number of others as troublesome intruders in Texas in 1849. The list as given contains several duplications and other errors. This name can not be identified with any regular tribe name, and may possibly be intended for a band of Cherokee under the leadership of the chief Degataga, known to the whites as Tokatoka. (J. M.)

Tolemato. A Yamasee village and mission station about 1595 on the coast of Georgia. In 1597, in anger at the reproofs of Father Corpa, the missionary, the son and heir of the chief of Guale organized a revolt against the missions, resulting in the murder of Father Corpa and 3 other missionaries, the destruction of much property at the different mission villages, and the abandonment of all the missions of that region for several years. See Topiqui. (J. M.)

Tolowa. An Athapaskan tribe of extreme N. w. California. When first known they occupied the coast from the mouth of Ataakut, Meetkeni, Stuntusunwhott, Targhinaatun, Thltusmetunne, and Turghestitsatun. They were gathered on a reservation in 1862, which was established on leased land, but it was abandoned in 1868, since which time the Tolowa have shifted for themselves. They are much demoralized and greatly reduced in numbers. Their language is unintelligible to the Hupa. In culture they resemble the Hupa and the Yurok, the chief difference being in their folklore and religion. They have been greatly influenced by the sea.

Tomachichi. See Tomochichu.

Tomahawk. The name applied to a weapon or a group of weapons in common use among the Algonquian tribes of E. United States. The early writers on Virginia cite the word from the dialects of that region as tommahick, tomahack, tamahake, tamahac (Strachey, 1612), etc.; other early forms are tommyhawk and tomhog (Church, Philip's War, 24, 1716). The Delaware dialect has tomahikan; the Mahican, tummahecon; the Massachusetts, tomhegan; the Abnaki, tamahigan. The word has come into English probably from the Virginian dialect. That this word is common to widely scattered Algonquian peoples is indicated by the fact that ootommoheggan is the Cree word for hammer. A common conception of the tomahawk is that it was the nearest aboriginal representative of the European hatchet, although the term was early applied to various forms of the club, as indicated in the following citations.

Describing a clandestine visit to one of the houses of worship of the Virginia Indians, Beverley says: "We found large Shelves, and upon these Shelves three Mats, each of which was roll'd up, and sow'd fast. These we handed down to the light, and to save time in unlacing the Seams, we made use of a Knife, and ripp'd them, without doing any damage to the Mats. In one of these we found some vast Bones, which we judg'd to be the Bones of Men, particularly we measur'd one Thigh-bone, and found it two foot nine inches long: In another Mat, we found some Indian Tomahawks finely forth by Rogers: "Another instrument of great esteem and importance among them is the tomahawk. This is an ancient weapon universally used by them in war, before they were taught the use of iron and steel; since which hatchets have been substituted in lieu of them. But this instrument still retains its use and importance in public transactions; and, like the pipe, is often very significant. This weapon is formed much like a hatchet, having a long stem or handle; the head is a round ball or knob of solid wood, well enough calculated to knock men's brains out, which on the other side of the stem terminates in a point where the edge would be, if made a hatchet, which point is set a little hooking or coming toward the stem; and near the center, where the stem or handle pierces the

Among these Tomahawks was the largest that ever I saw; there was fasten'd to it a Wild Turkey's Beard painted red, and two of the longest Feathers of his Wings hung dangling at it, by a string of about 6 Inches long, ty'd to the end of the Tomahawk." "The tomahawk likewise is ornamented with feathers and paintings, disposed and variegated in many significant forms, according to the occasion and end for which it is used, and on it they keep journals of their marches and most important and noted occurrences in a kind of hieroglyphics. When the council is called to deliberate war, the tomahawk is painted all over red, and when the council sits it is laid down by the chief, and if war is concluded upon, the captain of the young warriors takes it up and with it in his hands dances and sings the war-song, as before mentioned. When the council is over, this hatchet, or some other of the kind, is sent by the hands of some warrior to every tribe concerned, and with it he presents a belt of wampum and delivers his message, throwing the hatchet on the ground, which is taken up by one of their most expert warriors, if they chuse to join; if not, they return it, and with a belt of their wampum suitable to the occasion." (Knox, Voy. and Trav., II, 165-6, 1767.)

The following from McCulloh's Researches (134, 1829) is of much later date than the preceding, and indicates the conception of the tomahawk at that time: "The tomahawk, which is sometimes considered a weapon peculiar to the American Indians, was originally a club carved into some convenient shape. It was most commonly a stout stick about three feet in length, terminating in a large knob, wherein a projecting bone or flint was often inserted. The hatchets of the Indians that are now called tomahawks are of European device, and the stone hatchets so often found in our fields and called by the same term were not military weapons, but mechanical tools." See Aras, Calumet, Celts, Hatchets.

Tomassee. The name of two or more former Cherokee settlements, viz: (1) On Tomassee cr. of Keowee r., in Oconee co., S. C.; (2) on Little Tennessee r. near the entrance of Burningtown cr., in Macon co., S. C. The correct form and interpretation of the name are unknown. Timosay.—Mooney in 19th Rep. B. A. E., 535, 1900 (quoted form). Tomassee.—Doc. of 1755 quoted by Royce in 5th Rep. B. A. E., 143, 1887. Tymahse.—Mooney, op. cit. (quoted form).

Tomau. A noted Menominee chief, properly called Thomas Carron. He was born, according to Grignon (Wis. Hist. Soc. Coll., III, 267, 1857), about 1752, though the inscription on the monument erected over his grave by John Law, of Green Bay, makes him but 56 years of age at his death, July 8, 1818 (Morse, Rep. Sec. War, 53, 1822; Draper in Wis. Hist. Soc. Coll., I, 58, 1855). He was the second son of Old Carron, a half-blood French and Menominee, acting head chief. His mother was probably an Abnaki. Though not the official chief of the tribe by inheritance, he was regarded as chief in authority, since the hereditary title was held by one incapable of ruling. He was met by Zebulon Pike in 1805, who employed him as guide and speaks of his friendship for Americans, though subsequent acts did not serve to confirm this opinion. It is, however, true that, notwithstanding Tecumseh's eloquent appeal to the Menominee to join in the war on the United States settlements, Tomau stood firmly for peace, yielding only so far as to consent that such of his young men as wished to join as individuals might do so. He advised against so doing, however, and only a few availed themselves of the privilege. Later, on the other hand, Tomau allied himself with the British, and with probably 100 of his warriors accompanied Col. Dickson in 1812 in the capture from the Americans of Ft Mackinaw, though there was no fighting. It was during this expedition that Oshkosh was placed under Tomau's special care. He was also with Proctor and Dickson in the attack on Ft Sandusky, and in 1814, with about 80 Menominee, accompanied Dickson to Mackinaw, where they took part in the battle in which the American commander Maj. Holmes fell. In 1816 Tomau gave permission to the United States troops to build a fort in Menominee territory. Two years later he died at Mackinaw from excessive intoxication, and was buried there. Tomau was of the Prairie-chicken clan, and was thrice married; his first wife, Kiwakomuqkiu ('Wandering Around') was a Menominee woman, by whom he had two sons. Separating from this wife he married two sisters, with both of whom he lived until they died and by one of whom he had four children. Consult Hoffman in 14th Rep. B. A. E., pt. 1, 54, 1896.

Tombigbee (Itúmbi-bíkpi, 'coffin maker.'—Gatschet). A former Choctaw town on or near Tombigbee r., w. Alabama.

Tomé (contr. of the name of Abbé Santo Tomás.—Lummis). A former pueblo of Genizaros (q. v.), situated on the Rio Grande 2 leagues s. of Isleta, N. Mex., on the site of a prehistoric pueblo, probably of the Tigua. The inhabitants of the settlement consisted of neophytes who had been captured by the Apache and Comanche, sold by them to the Spaniards, and released from servitude by the governor of New Mexico to form this settlement as a mission visita of Isleta pueblo. This seems to have been in 1740, although in the previous year a grant of 121,593 acres in and about Tomé was made to J. Valera and others, representing 30 families, evidently Spanish (Bancroft, N. Mex. and Ariz., 243, 253, 758-9, 1889). In 1748 Villa-Señor (Theatro Am., 416) reported the population to be 40 families; in 1766 there were 70 families. According to Lumis (New Mex. David, 95, 100, 1891) Tomé was settled by Ignacio Baca with 50 Spanish families in 1769, and it seems to have lost its character as an Indian settlement about this time. From 1852 to 1872 and from 1874 to 1876 Tomé was the county seat of Valencia co. In the spring of 1905 it was destroyed by a sudden rise of the Rio Grande. (F. W. H.)

Tomochic ('winter house,'—Och). A Tarahumare settlement in w. Chihuahua, Mexico, near the head of Mayo r., lat. 28° 30', lon. 107° 40'.—Orozco y Berra, Geog., 323, 1864.

Tomochichi (spelled also Beachee, Tomochichi, Thamachaychee, Thomochichi, Tomachachi, Tomeychee, etc., and said by Gatschet to mean 'the one who comes to fly up' ['']) A Creek chief, noted in the early history of Georgia. He was originally of Apalachukla, a Lower Creek town on Chattahoochee r. in Alabama, and his name appears in behalf of this settlement in a treaty between the Creeks and the Carolina government in 1721. Shortly afterward, for some unknown reason, he was outlawed from his people and withdrew with a few followers to Savannah r., where, by permission of South Carolina, he established himself in a new town called Yamacraw (q. v.), at the present Savannah, Ga. On the foundation of the Georgia colony by Oglethorpe in 1733, Tomochichi assumed a friendly attitude toward the newcomers and was instrumental in bringing about a treaty of alliance between that colony and the Lower Creeks in that year. At the same time a reconciliation was effected between himself and his tribe, and he was given permission to collect his friends from the various Lower Creek towns to take up their residence with him at Yamacraw. In the next year, 1734, with his wife, nephew, and several others, he accompanied Oglethorpe to England, where his well-known portrait was painted. He continued to be helpful to the colonists after his return until his death, which occurred in his own town, Oct. 5, 1739, he being then perhaps 75 years of age. He was given a public funeral at Savannah, where a monument to his memory was erected in 1889 by the Colonial Dames of America. Consult Gatschet, Creek Migr. Leg., I, II, 1884, 1888; Jones, Hist. Sketch of Tomochichi, 1868.

The portrait here reproduced, representing the chief and his nephew Toonahowi, is from an engraving by Kleinschmidt, of Augsburg, Germany, of the original painting by Verelst in 1734, which for some years hung in the room of the Georgia Office in London. This engraving appeared as the frontispiece in Ullsperger, Ausführliche Nachricht von den Salzburgerischen Emigranten, Halle, 1735, and has since been reproduced in Jones, Hist. of Ga., I, 1883; Winsor, Narr. and Crit. Hist. Am., v, 1887, and elsewhere. (J. M.)

Tom Pung. An old name for a cutter; a pung. According to Trumbull (Trans. Am. Philol. Assn., 26, 1872), "a hundred years ago a one-horse sleigh, whether a jumper or a cutter, was called in Massachusetts a 'Tom Pung'—written and pronounced as if the syllables were two independent words." In Dennie's Farmers' Museum (243, 1798) a writer represents the town of Roxbury, Mass., as sending to Boston "the gliding Tom Pung and the rattling cart." Tom Pung is the older word of which pung is a reduction. Trumbull, with apparent justification, derives Tom Pung from toboggan (q. v.) through folk-etymology. (A. F. C.)

Tōna-kwe.—Cushing in 13th Rep. B. A. E., 368, 1896 (kwe = 'people').

Tonachic ('where there are pillars'). A Tarahumare pueblo, containing a total of 604 inhabitants in 1900; situated in the district of San Andrés del Rio, Chihuahua, Mexico. Lumholtz states that when he visited the place in 1890 it contained about 2,700 inhabitants, and that the Indians had been more or less driven off by the whites. In mission times Tonachic was a place of some importance. It still has a fine church with some rich furnishings, though many of them have been stolen. See Lumholtz, Unknown Mex., I, 204, 1902.

now made by the Spaniards to the policy of assassination. After much intriguing and waiting, El Mocho was taken unawares on July 12, 1784, and murdered in the plaza at Bahía (Goliad), a place fated to be in later days the scene of other equally atrocious deeds. It is to be remarked that for the story of these dark dealings of both the Spanish authorities and their enemy we have only the reports, entirely candid, of the former (Cazorla, Capt. of Bahía, to Cabello, July 12, 1784, Archivo General, Hist., vol. c; Cabello to Neve, July 15, ibid.).

The removal of El Mocho was justified by subsequent events. By June, 1785, Courbière was able to report that the new Tonkawa chief had established a permanent village on Navasota r.; and during the next 10 years "the village of the Tancagues" was referred to as though it were a fixed and definite entity. But thereafter the tribe was usually described as wanderers; thereafter, likewise, they were alternately at peace and at war with the Spaniards (Cabello to Rengel, June 7, 1785, Béxar Archives; Gil Ybarbo to Governor Muñoz, Mar. 22 and Apr. 26, 1791, Béxar Archives; Leal, Noticia, July 10, 1794, Béxar Archives).

Population; Recent History.—A junta held at Béxar, Jan. 5, 1778, estimated the Tonkawa at 300 warriors. In April of that year Mezières, when on his second visit to the tribe, gave the same figure, including some apostate Xaraname (Aranama). In Sept., 1779, when again at their settlement, he reported that since the recent epidemic of smallpox there remained 150 warriors. Three years later a spy who spent several days at a gathering of Apache and Tonkawa on Guadalupe r. reported that only 600 Tonkawa were present, the rest having remained at home. If he told the truth, he could hardly have meant that these were all warriors. Sibley in 1805 gave their strength at 200 men; Davenport, about 1809, placed it at 250 families, and Terán, 1828, at 80 families. In 1847 the official estimate was 150 men (see Cabello, Informe, 1784, 12, 63; Mezières, Letters to Croix, Apr. 5, 1778, and Sept. 13, 1779, in Mem. de Nueva España, xxviii, 272, 246; Sibley, op. cit.; Davenport, Noticia, ca. 1809, MS. in Archivo Gen.; Terán, Noticia, 1828, in Bol. Soc. Geog. Mex., 266, 1870). In the fall of 1855 the Government settled them, together with the Caddo, Kichai, Waco, Tawakoni, and Penateka Comanche, upon two small reservations on the Clear Fork of Brazos r., Texas. In consequence of the violent opposition of the Texans, culminating in an attack upon the agency, the Indians were removed in 1857 to Washita r., Okla., the Tonkawa being temporarily camped about the mouth of Tonkawa cr., just above the present Anadarko. In the confusion brought about by the civil war the other tribes saw an opportunity to pay off old scores against the Tonkawa, who were generally hated for their cannibalistic practices as well as for serving as government scouts against the more western tribes. On the excuse that the Tonkawa and their agent were in alliance with the Confederacy, a body of Delawares, Shawnee, and Caddo attacked the Anadarko agency and the Tonkawa camp on the night of Oct. 25, 1862, killing two of the agency employees and massacring 137 men, women, and children out of a total of about 300 of the Tonkawa tribe. The survivors, after some years of miserable wandering, were finally gathered in at Ft Griffin, Texas, to save them from complete extermination by their enemies. In 1884 all that were left—92, including a number of Lipan—were removed to Oklahoma, being assigned the next year to their present location at Oakland agency, near Ponca. In 1908 they numbered but 48, including several intermarried Lipan.

The Tonkawa remember a number of subdivisions, which seem to have been subtribes rather than gentes, as follows: Awash, Choyopan, Haiwal, Hatchukuni, Kwesh, Nilhawai, Ninchopan, Pakani, Pakhalatch (see Pajalat), Sanukh, Talpkweyu, Titskanwatichatak. (H. E. B.)

Tontos (Span.: 'fools,' so called on account of their supposed imbecility; the designation, however, is a misnomer). A name so indiscriminately applied as to be almost meaningless. (1) To a mixture of Yavapai, Yuma, and Mohave, with some Pinaleno Apache, placed on the Rio Verde res., Ariz., in 1873, and transferred to San Carlos res. in 1875; best designated as the Tulkepaia, q. v. (2) To a tribe of the Athapascan family well known as Coyotero Apache. (3) To the Pinalenos of the same family. (4) According to Corbuser, to a body of Indians descended mostly from Yavapai men and Pinal Coyotero (Pinaleno) women who have intermarried. The term Tontos was therefore applied by writers of the 19th century to practically all the Indians roaming between the White mts. of Arizona and the Rio Colorado, comprising parts of two linguistic families, but especially to the Yavapai, commonly known as Apache Mohave. The synonymy following, therefore, does not always represent true equivalents of any tribal name. The Tonto Apache transferred to San Carlos in 1875 numbered 629, while the Yavapai sent to that reserve numbered 618 and the Tulkepaia 352. The Tontos officially designated as such numbered 772 in 1908, cated peace, and frequently exercised a restraining influence on the more warlike of his people, but was quick to avenge an injury to the members of his tribe. In 1818, when Tooantuh was about 64 years of age, a party of Osage wantonly murdered several Cherokee. Tooantuh, with a band of followers, went in pursuit, and by the time the Osage had reached their village they were surprised by an attack, their village burned, 80 of them killed or captured, and their band completely broken. He served under Gen. Jackson in the campaign against the Creeks in 1813-14, and was conspicuous for his coolness and discipline shown in battle. On the removal of the Cherokee to Indian Ter., Tooantuh was among the first to settle on a farm, devoting himself the remainder of his days to agriculture.

Tooantuh (properly Dústú, a species of frog; known also as Spring Frog). A noted Cherokee of highly respected character, born near the mouth of Chukka-

Tooelicans (Too-el-icna). Mentioned by Irving (Bonneville's Adventures, 388, 1850) as a tribe dwelling about the headwaters of Willowa r., in s. e. Oregon, in connection with the Shoshoko. They are spoken of as shy and avoiding intercourse with the whites; possibly a Shoshoni band, otherwise unidentified.

Topenebee (according to J. P. Dunn the name indicates 'a quiet sitting bear', the 'bear' part being probably understood from the "totem" reference). A noted Potawatomi, chief of his tribe in s. Michigan for 40 years. He first appears in history as a signer, in behalf of the "Pattawatimas of the river St Joseph," of the celebrated treaty of Aug. 3, 1795, negotiated by Anthony Wayne with numerous tribes at Greenville, Ohio; from that time until 1833 he signed eleven other treaties between the United States and the Potawatomi, and in another (Sept. 30, 1809) his mark was made by his brother, Shissahecon. By the treaty of Oct. 27, 1832, under the provisions of which the Potawatomi ceded their territory in Michigan s. of Grand r., Topenebee was granted a section of land by patent. When Tecumseh visited the Potawatomi in 1810 for the purpose of enlisting their aid in the uprising against the whites, Topenebee became an adherent of the new doctrine and led his warriors to join the union. The Potawatomi readily fell prey to the encroachment of the whites, and suffered the usual effect of the introduction of liquor; to this Topenebee was no exception. On one occasion Lewis Cass, serving as treaty commissioner, on advising him to keep sober and care for his people, was characteristically answered, "Father, we do not care for the land, nor the money, nor the goods: what we want is whiskey; give us whiskey!" He was present at the Ft Dearborn massacre, Chicago, Aug. 15, 1812, and aided in saving the lives of the Kinzies, Mrs Heald, Mrs Helm, and Sergeant Griffith. Subordinate to Topenebee were the subchiefs Pokagon, Weesaw, and Shavehead. The wife of Pokagon was a niece of Topenebee, and Weesaw married Topenebee's daughter. On the removal of the tribe to the W. in 1838, under the provisions of the treaty of 1833, Topenebee, Pokagon, and others remained behind and took up lands in Silver Creek twp., where Topenebee died in Aug. 1840.

Topenebee's Village. A Potawatomi village, taking its name from the chief, which formerly existed on St Joseph r., opposite Niles, Berrien co., Mich. The reservation was sold in 1833.

Tornait. A winter village of the Nugumiut Eskimo above Bear sd., in Frobisher bay, Baffin land.—Boas in 6th Rep. B. A. E., 422, 1888.

Tornit. A fabulous race which the Central Eskimo believe to be akin to themselves, but much taller and stronger, having very long arms and legs and being able to toss huge boulders as though they were pebbles. The Akudnirmiut call them Tuniqdjuait. They lived with the Eskimo in stone houses larger than theirs, as shown by the ruins that are still pointed out. Under their long deerskin coats they carried lamps with which to cook the meat of seals as soon as they were killed. They could make stone implements only, no bows nor kaiaks, but these they stole from the Eskimo, who were afraid to defend their property until a young Eskimo drilled a hole in the skull of one of them who had ruined his kaiak, while the giant was asleep. The Tornit then feared that they would all be killed, and secretly stole away, cutting off the skirts of their coats and tying up their hair so that they should not be recognized if pursued. The Greenland Eskimo believed the Tornit to be a mythical race of giants who lived on the ice cap and were seen rarely hunting at the heads of the fiords. The Labrador Eskimo, like those of Hudson bay and Baffin land, imagine them to be more like themselves.—Boas in 6th

To-sarke.—Dodge in Ind. Aff. Rep. 1859, 374, 1860.

Toshence. The last of anything: a term local in Massachusetts. Gerard (Sun, N. Y., July 30, 1895) states that the word consists of the two last syllables of mat-tasons, the Massachuset name for the last child of the family. Trumbull (Natick Dict., 73, 1903) gives the Massachuset term as muttásons, 'youngest son,' with the suggested etymology mat-asu, 'not after,' of which muttásons would appear to be a diminutive. Gerard (inf'n, 1908) gives as the true meaning 'the little after which naught,' i. e., 'the last little one,' hence, by extension, the very last of anything. (A. F. C.)

Toshittan (Tos-hit-tan, 'shark house people'). Given as the name of a social division among the Nanyaayi at Wrangell, Alaska, but really only a name for the inhabitants of a certain house, Ketgohit, belonging to them.

Totsikala.—Ibid., 163.

Totem (irregularly derived from the term otoleman of the Chippewa and other cognate Algonquian dialects, signifying generically 'his brother-sister kin,' of which ote is the grammatic stem signifying (1) the consanguine kinship existing between a propositus and a uterine elder sister or elder brother; and (2) the consanguine kinship existing between uterine brothers and sisters, inclusive of alien persons naturalized into such kinship group by the rite of adoption (q. v.); that is, the uterine brother-sister group of persons, thus delimited by blood ties or legal fictions, who in each generation are severally and collectively related as uterine brothers and sisters, among whom intermarriage is strictly forbidden, and who therefore constitute an incest group in so far as its members are severally concerned. The stem ote is never employed in discourse without a prefixed personal pronoun denotive of the grammatic relation of person, or without the nominal suffix -m, indicative of exclusive possessive relation, approximately equivalent to English 'own,' or without the objective third person ending -an in Chippewa and -a in Cree. In the following irregular manner has the word totem been produced from the first cited expression otoleman (otolema in the Cree): by dropping the initial o-, 'his,' by unwarrantedly retaining as a proclitic the epenthetic -t- whose use in this and similar combinations is for the purpose of avoiding the coalescence of the two adjunct o-vowels, and by dropping the objective third person suffix -an, and by erroneously retaining the exclusive possessive suffix -m, thus producing totem from otoleman instead of the grammatic stem ote. Thus the word totem in form is not in any sense a grammatic derivative of its primary. And so ote, the conceptual element of the factitious word totem, has no demonstrable relation to the notion "clay," or "mark," as hitherto assumed.

The Abbé Thavenet, a missionary to the Algonkin at Lake of the Two Mountains, Canada, in the early part of the 19th century, wrote an explanation of the use and meaning of the stem ote, in part as follows: "It is to be presumed that in uniting into a tribe, each clan preserved its manitou, the animal which in the country whence the clan came was the most beautiful or the most friendly to man, or the most feared, or the most common; the animal which was ordinarily hunted there and which was the ordinary subsistence of the clan, etc.; that this animal became the symbol of each family and that each family transmitted it to its posterity to be the perpetual symbol of each tribe [clan]. One then must when speaking of a clan designate it by the animal which is its symbol. Makwa nindotem then signifies 'the Bear is my clan, I am of the clan of the Bear,' and not at all, as is commonly said, 'the Bear is my mark.' When an Indian says to another pindikē nindotem, can one believe that he says to him, 'enter then, my mark?' Is it not more reasonable to believe that he says to him, 'enter then, my clansman,' as we say, 'enter then, my countryman?' But since the traders, and the Indians in imitation of them, attach to the word otem, the idea of mark, I know that I must not offend too much against this prejudice" (cited by Cuoq, Lex. de la Lang. Algonq., 313, 1886). Here Thavenet gives the correct native Algonkin usage of the term, and also the traditional native explanation of the origin of the clan patron spirits. As a translation of 'family-mark,' Bishop Baraga (Otchipwe Dict. and Gram., 1878-82) wrote odem; but, being evidently aware that this rendering does not express the true sense of the term, he added parenthetically, "odem or otem, means only his parents, relations. In Cree, ototema, his relations" — thus clearly indicating that 'family-mark' is a definition of ote-m, which is not an element of the native concept of the stem. Under ototema, in his list of terms of kinship, Lacombe (Dict. de la Langue des Cris, 1874) wrote "kinsman, relation," without any reference to 'family-mark.' Constructively confirmative of the definition of the stem ote, given above, is the evidence found in the analysis of the common Algonquian term otenā or otenaw, signifying 'village, town, or settlement.' Its component lexical elements are ote, 'brother-sister kin,' 'clan,' and the nominal adformative -nā, signifying 'a dwelling-place'; whence it is seen that otenā or otenaw originally meant 'the dwelling-place of the clan,' or 'dwelling-place of the brother-sister kin.'

In specifying the name of a particular clan or gens it is necessary commonly to employ the name, usually a cognomen only, of the object or animal by which that clan or gens is distinguished from all others and by which it is protected, where such a cult is in vogue. There are other methods of distinguishing related or confederated groups one from another. The purely philosophical term "totemism" is of course a Caucasian derivative of the word totem, and has a wide and varied application. The term totem has been rather indiscriminately applied to any one of several classes of imaginary beings which are believed by a large number of the Indian tribes and peoples of North America to be the tutelary, the guardian, or the patron spirit or being of a person, or of an organization of persons, where such a cult or practice prevails.

The native American Indian, holding peculiar self-centered views as to the unity and continuity of all life and the consequent inevitable interrelations of the several bodies and beings in nature, especially of man to the beings and bodies of his experience and environment, to whom were imputed by him various anthropomorphic attributes and functions in addition to those naturally inherent in them, has developed certain fundamentally important cults, based on those views, that deeply affect his social, religious, and civil institutions. One of these doctrines is that persons and organizations of persons are one and all under the protecting and fostering tutelage of some imaginary being or spirit. These tutelary or patron beings may be grouped, by the mode and the motive of their acquirement and their functions, into two fairly well defined groups or classes: (1) those which protect individuals only, and (2) those which protect organizations of persons. But with these two classes of tutelary beings is not infrequently confounded another class of protective imaginary beings, commonly called fetishes (see Fetish), which are regarded as powerful spiritual allies of their possessors. Each of these several classes of guardian beings has its own peculiar traditions, beliefs, and appropriate cult. The modes of the acquirement and the motives for the acquisition of these several classes of guardian beings differ in some fundamental and essential respects. The exact method of acquiring the clan or gentile group patrons or tutelaries is still an unsolved problem, although several plausible theories have been advanced by astute students to explain the probable mode of obtaining them. With respect to the personal tutelary and the fetish, the data are sufficiently clear and full to permit a satisfactory description and definition of these two classes of tutelary and auxiliary beings. From the available data bearing on this subject, it would seem that much confusion regarding the use and acquirement of personal and communal tutelaries or patron beings has arisen by regarding certain social, political, and religious activities as due primarily to the influence of these guardian deities, when in fact those features were factors in the social organization on which has been later imposed the cult of the patron or guardian spirit. Exogamy, names and class names, and various taboos exist where "totems" and "totemism," the cults of the guardian spirits, do not exist.

Some profess to regard the clan or gentile group patron or tutelary as a mere development of the personal guardian, but from the available but insufficient data bearing on the question, it appears to be, in some of its aspects, more closely connected in origin, or rather in the method of its acquisition, with the fetish, the Iroquois otchinā'kēm'dā, 'an effective agency of sorcery,' than with any form of the personal tutelary. This patron spirit of course concerns the group regarded as a body, for with regard to each person of the group, the clan or gentile guardian is inherited, or rather acquired, by birth, and it may not be changed at will. On the other hand, the personal tutelary is obtained through the rite of vision in a dream or a trance, and it must be preserved at all hazards as one of the most precious possessions. The fetish is acquired by personal choice, by purchase, or by inheritance, or from some chance circumstance or emergency, and it can be sold or discarded at the will of the possessor, in most cases; the exception is where a person has entered into a compact with some evil spirit or being that, in consideration of human or other sacrifices in its honor at stated periods, the said spirit undertakes to perform certain obligations to this man or woman, and in default of which the person forfeits his right to live.

"Totemism" is a purely philosophical term which modern anthropologic literature has burdened with a great mass of needless controversial speculation and opinion. The doctrine and use of tutelary or patron guardian spirits by individuals and by organized bodies of persons were defined by Powell as "a method of naming," and as "the doctrine and system of naming." But the motive underlying the acquisition and use of guardian or tutelary spirits, whether by an individual or by an organized body of persons, is always the same, namely, to obtain welfare and to avoid ill-fare. So it appears to be erroneous to define this cult as "the doctrine and system of naming." It is rather the recognition, exploitation, and adjustment of the imaginary mystic relations of the individual or of the body of organized persons to the postulated orendas (q. v.), mystic powers, surrounding each of these units of native society. With but few exceptions, the recognized relation between the clan or gens and its patron deity is not one of descent or source, but rather that of protection, guardianship, and support. The relationship as to source between these two classes of superior beings is not yet determined; so to avoid confusion in concepts, it is better to use distinctive names for them, until their connection, if any, has been definitely ascertained: this question must not be prejudged. The hypothetic inclusion of these several classes in a general one, branded with the rubric "totem" or its equivalent, has led to needless confusion. The native tongues have separate names for these objects, and until the native classification can be truthfully shown to be erroneous, it would seem to be advisable to designate them by distinctive names.

Notwithstanding the great amount of study of the literature of the social features of aboriginal American society, there are many data relative to this subject that have been overlooked or disregarded.

Long (Voy. and Trav., 86-87, 1791), a trader among the Chippewa in the latter half of the 18th century, wrote: "One part of the religious superstition of the Savages, consists in each of them having his totam, or favourite spirit, which he believes watches over him. This totam they conceive assumes the shape of some beast or other, and therefore they never kill, hunt, or eat the animal whose form they think this totam bears." He adds: "This idea of destiny, or, if I may be allowed the phrase, 'totamism,' however strange, is not confined to the Savages." From this misleading and confused statement have the words totam and its derivative totamism, slightly changed in spelling, been introduced into literature. In this crude statement Long described the personal tutelary, but gave it the name signifying 'clan kinship.' He or his interpreter was evidently led into this error by the custom of distinguishing a particular clan from others, when speaking of them, by the class name or cognomen of its patron or tutelary; it was due to faulty diction, for it is not probable that the Chippewa and their related tribes would have an object, believed to shape the course of human life, which had no distinctive name. Such a name is recorded by the eminent German traveler, Kohl, who was among the Chippewa and neighboring tribes in 1855. He said (Kitchi-Gami, 58, 1860) that these Indians deify natural strength and terrestrial objects; that nearly every Indian had discovered such an object, in which special confidence is placed by him, and to which he more frequently directs his thoughts and to which he more zealously sacrifices, than to any other being; that the Chippewa proper name for these objects is nigouimes, which signifies 'my hope,' approximately; that one calls a tree, another a stone or rock, 'his hope.' The rendering 'my hope' is probably only an approximate expression of the native concept embodied in the term, the derivation of which is not definitely known. It may possibly be related to the Chippewa nagamón, 'song, chant,' and to the Cree nigamoheuw, 'to teach the knowledge of medicines by chanting.' But nigouimes is the Chippewa name of the personal tutelary, whatever may be its etymologic derivation.

Owing to misapprehension of externals and therefore to misinterpretation of them in the vast body of literature on the significance of imaginary patrons or tutelaries of persons and of organizations of persons, totem has come to signify the patron or guardian, the tutelary or protector, of a person, of a clan or a gens, or of a society or tribe, hence to denote the name, crest, brand, or symbol of a clan, a man, a society, or a tribe, and, finally, to the fetish or familiar of a person. Its primary native use, with certain important limitations, makes it approximately equivalent to the English term 'one's kinship.'

The fact that the Indians themselves distinguished the fetish, the personal tutelary or guardian, and the clan, gentile, or society patron, one from another, by the use of appropriate appellations, rites, and observances, indicates, it would seem, a consciousness on their part that the differences in function, character, and mode of acquirement of these several classes of objects were sufficiently great to warrant them in doing so.

Among the Omaha and their congeners, according to Miss Fletcher, a youth at his initiation obtains his personal tutelary—his so-called totem—directly through the assumed efficacy of a definite rite performed by the young person himself: he does not inherit it from an ancestor, and he does not receive it as a gift from any living person. This ceremony of initiation into manhood rests on the assumption that man's powers and activities can be supplemented by the elements and the animals only through the grace of wakonda (q. v.), obtained by the rite of vision consisting of ritualistic acts and a fervent prayer of humility, expressing a longing for something not possessed, a consciousness of insufficiency of self, and an abiding desire for something capable of bringing welfare and prosperity to the suppliant. On reaching the age of puberty, the youth, under the instructions of his parents or other patrons, begins his initiation by having moistened earth placed on his head and face, by having a small bow and arrows given him, with directions to seek a secluded spot among the hills. Having reached such a place, he must chant the prescribed prayer, uplifting his hands, wet with his tears, to the heavens, and then he must place his hands on the earth; and he must fast until he falls asleep or into a trance. Whatsoever he sees or hears while in this state is the being that will become the special medium through which he can receive superhuman aid and comfort. Then, returning home, he rests and partakes of food. For four days he must speak but little, and he must not in that time reveal his vision under penalty of losing its producer. Later he may confide it to some old man, known to have had a similar vision or dream. Then it is his duty to seek until he finds the animal or bird seen in his revelation, when he must slay it, selecting and retaining a small part of it (in cases where no concrete form was seen, symbols of it are made to represent it). This token or memento is ever after the sign of his vision or dream, the most sacred thing he can ever possess. This symbol may consist of the feather of a bird, a tuft of hair or other part of an animal or a bird, a black stone, or a translucent pebble. This token or memento, his personal tutelary, is never the object of worship. It is the tie, the fragment, connecting its possessor with the potentiality and power of the entire species represented by the being or form seen in his vision or dream. Belonging to various objects and beings, all tutelaries are not equally potent in the view of the natives, for they can not exceed the power of the particular species to which they severally belong. Nevertheless, when the novice is being instructed for the rite of the vision, he is forbidden to ask in his prayer for the sight of any particular object. It is an opinion held among the natives that although no one may consciously choose his personal tutelary, natural gifts of mind and character are apt to attract powerful animals and agencies. Usually, the tutelary referred to members of the surrounding fauna—the deer, the buffalo, the bear, the turtle, the birds, and the reptiles; and to representatives of the flora—the corn; and to the elements—the thunder, the earth, the water, and the winds. Nothing in any manner connoted man himself. There is, moreover, no indication of ancestor-worship, and no suggestion of a natural blood kinship subsisting between the man and his tutelary. These statements embody very briefly the chief characteristics of the personal tutelary among the Omaha and the tribes linguistically related to them.

The influence of these guardian spirits on the social, religious, and political institutions of the natives differs greatly from tribe to tribe. Among the Omaha, those who have received visions of the same being or object usually unite into a cult or religious society. The Bear Society is composed of persons from every gentile kinship group who have seen a bear in the rite of the vision. The bond of union here was not blood kinship, but a communal right in a common apparition. These societies possess prescribed rites, rituals, and suitable officers. Miss Fletcher suggests that in the past the experience gained in the conduct of these cult or religious societies was later made useful in the formative period of the artificial social structure of the toñ-woñ-gdhoñ, or gens, of the Omaha. The native term signifies 'a place of dwellings where kindred dwell together,' which is not essentially different in meaning from the Algon-quian otenaw noted above. In this tribe there are ten ruling gentes, which are exogamous; they trace the descent of blood through the father only; they possess a particular name which refers directly or symbolically to the patron or tutelary of the gens; they have a gentile patron being, whose cult is marked by a taboo; they possess a gentile list of personal names peculiar to itself, of which one is given when the hair of a child is first cut, the form of which symbolizes the tutelary until he reaches the age of 7 years. This "cut" and the taboo are enforced under the threatened penalties of blindness, bodily deformity, and disease for any failure to observe faithfully these obligations. Each gens has obligatory cultural rites, in which its members offer respectful homage to the gentile patron spirit. These observances, however, do not imply ancestor-worship. The symbol of the gentile guardian spirit is borne through life and is placed on the dead for identification by the kindred. The gentile patron being, however, gives no immediate hold on the superhuman, as does the personal tutelary. It may be questioned whether the suggested development of a social organization by the establishment of distinct groups of persons who should be bound together by the ties of blood kinship, based on the pattern and experience of existing religious cults, is not a rather too conscious working-out of such ideas of a semi-barbaric people. It would seem to be a reversal of the usual course of social development.

According to Boas, the social organization of the Salish tribes of the interior of British Columbia is very loose, there being no recognized tribal unit. Village population among them undergoes frequent and considerable fluctuation, and there were no exogamic groups, no hereditary nobility, and no ritualistic societies. Nevertheless, the acquisition of guardian spirits at the age of puberty is an essential feature of their religious beliefs, and these tutelaries are obtained through prescribed ceremonials. However, only a few shamans are believed to have inherited their guardian spirits from their parents.

Hill-Tout says that the most characteristic feature of the social side of the religious activity of the Salish tribes of the coast and of the lower Fraser delta is "their totem or kin-group crests," and that these kin-groups are not commonly called by animal or plant names as among the Haida and the Tlingit. They are, however, distinguished one from another by crests, "each family of standing possessing its own crest or crests." These are plastic or pictographic emblems of the supposed ancestral "totems of the family or kin-group," and are regarded as the guardian spirits of the household.

Among the Vancouver id. tribes, these inherited crests largely replace the personal tutelary of the interior Salish which is there acquired by means of dreams and visions—not the ordinary dream or vision, but one superinduced by long and special ceremonial preparation. As the tutelary usually has only specific or specialized functions or spheres of action, the initiate may not be satisfied with the first one thus received, and so enters upon a second, a third, and even a fourth ceremonial preparation for a dream or a vision; and so he may be years in seeking what is satisfactory to him (Ontario Arch. Rep., xviii, 229, 230, 1905). Hill-Tout adds that between the tutelary and the person a very mystic relationship is supposed to exist. Prayer in the usual sense was not offered to the tutelary, but its aid and protection were rather expected as its duty in warning the obsessed person by dreams and visions of approaching danger in all the issues of life.

Teit (Mem. Am. Mus. Nat. Hist., Anthr., i, 354, 1898-1900), writing of the Thompson River Indians (Ntlakypamuk), says that every person had his own guardian spirit which was obtained during the puberty ceremonies, and that none except a few shamans inherited without these rites their parental tutelary spirits which had been regarded as particularly powerful. He also states that "there were no totems, except at Spuzzum, where two families, who were descendants of members of the coast tribes, claimed the totems of their ancestors," but that "blood relationship was considered a tie which extended over generations, both in the male and the female lines," a statement which clearly indicates that blood kinship with what it implies is above all others the great cohesive force in savage life.

Father Morice says that among the western Déné there were several kinds of tutelary or patron spirits or beings—the clan patron, the fetish (his honorific), and the personal tutelary, to which may be added those local deities which preside over some rock, cave, or consecrated spot. Father Morice believes that the cult of the clan patron and the fetish (his honorific) came to the Déné from the natives of the Pacific coast. He states that the honorific was assumed with appropriate rites by any person desirous of gaining social rank, to which they could not otherwise aspire owing to certain restrictions of the laws of heredity. This authority does not relate how the clan tutelary is acquired among these people, but he says that the "personal totems" are those primary spirits which occasionally manifest themselves to man, are personified in the earthly individuals of the faunal and the floral worlds, and give evidence of a beneficent disposition by adopting a person as a ward and protecting him through life in return for some kindness shown their incarnate and terrestrial representatives—the animals and the plants and other objects of human environment. They reveal themselves in dreams and visions. Father Morice is of the opinion that “totemism” among the Déné is not a social institution, but that it is exclusively a religious cult; he is inclined to regard the clan patron spirit as a mere extension of the cult of the personal tutelary, but assigns no satisfactory reason for this belief. The owner of a tutelary must circumspectly bear about his person and openly exhibit in his lodge the spoils of the animal denoted by it—its entire skin, or only a part of it, or a carved emblem of it; and under no circumstances would anything induce him wilfully to kill it, or at least to eat the flesh of the being, the prototype of which had become, as it were, sacred to him. Its aid and protection are asked on all important occasions and emergencies. It would appear that this writer, in his attempt to explain the clan patron, has confused the fetish (honorific) with the personal tutelary. The hidden power with which the devotee believes he has thus become possessed he calls coen in the Carrier tongue, which signifies ‘at the same time magic and song,’ thus closely approximating the Iroquois orenda. Morice (Ontario Arch. Rep., xviii, 206, 1905) relates that, in preparing himself for practice, the shaman divests himself of all his raiment and dons the spoils (a bearskin, the claws of a grizzly bear, the feathers of an owl, etc.) or the mask of his fetish or tutelary. He states that each of the Déné clans has a patron spirit, an animal or other being, traditionally connected with the establishment of these political and social units in pristine times, and to which the members of the clans paid great respect and even veneration. On ceremonial occasions the entire clan is impersonated by it, for it becomes the symbol or crest of the clan. He adds that the personal tutelary, common to both the eastern and the western Déné, “being as indigenous to them as most of the institutions in vogue among all the northern American Indians,” is an essential element of their religious system and does not affect “society as such.”

Spinden (Mem. Am. Anthr. Asso., ii, 241, 1908) writes that among the Nez Percé Indians there is “a lack of anything like a gens grouping,” adding that the social organization of the Shahaptian stock furnishes excellent material for the study of the simple development of a tribe, and that “the tribes arose from the natural division of the stock according to the geographical areas.” The Nez Percés sent their children, both boys and girls, at about 10 years of age, to the mountains to fast and keep vigil, for the purpose of acquiring, if possible, a guardian spirit. But it is not everyone who succeeds in obtaining such a tutelary. The name or description of the thing seen is adopted as a sacred name, which sometimes denoted some trophy of the hunt borne by the imaginary animal seen in vision. The imaginary being, thus obtained as a tutelary, is believed to protect its possessor and to endow him with “certain physical or mental qualities and pronounced skill in certain things,” especially those properties or qualities most characteristic of the animal or object seen. The Sun imparted wisdom and mystic insight. There are certain restrictions in regard to the killing of the guardian animal; and “the names and the sacred songs obtained by vigil descended through the family,” some persons inheriting as many as 10 or 15 songs (p. 249). But it does not appear that the guardian spirit itself was thus inherited. The tutelary animal was not usually named by its ordinary title, but by a special name, and some have several such cognomens (p. 263). In the case of shamans, men and women, the guardian beings were regarded as of a higher class or order, as they commonly represented objects from the heavens—the sun, the moon, the clouds, the eagle, the fish-hawk, and the crane.

Speck (Ethn. Yuchi Indians, Anthr. Pub. Univ. Pa., i, 70 et seq., 1909) says that the Yuchi trace descent through the female line and that therefore these people have clans; that “the members of each clan believe that they are relatives and, in some vague way, the descendants of certain preëxisting animals whose names and identity they now bear. The animal ancestors are accordingly totemic. In regard to the living animals, they, too, are the earthly types and descendants of the preëxisting ones, hence, since they trace their descent from the same sources as the human clans, the two are consanguinely related,” so that the members of a clan feel obliged not to do violence to the wild animal having the form and name of their tutelaries. The flesh or fur of such animals may be obtained from the members of other clans, who are under no obligation not to kill these animals. The idea of clan is expressed by the word yū'ta, ‘on the house.’ Our authority adds that the different individuals of the clans inherited the protection of their clan totems when they passed the initiation rites, thenceforth retaining these as protectors through life. As the members of clans are considered to be the descendants of their totemic animals, they are in a sense the cousins, so to speak, of the earthly animals which are also descendants of the supernatural animals. The clan taboos and incidental beliefs need not be repeated here, as they have been mentioned in dealing with customs and the clans. But the animals of the earth, in general, are considered as thinking beings, with interests in life, customs, and feelings not unlike those of men. Even to-day these mutual elements in the lives of men and animals are felt to exist. The animals are all believed to have their protecting supernatural kinsmen, as well as men; for that reason in hunting them their protecting spirits have to be overcome before one can hope to bring them down. It is the same with human beings. If one's guardian spirit is all right, no harm can come. So in warfare, the idea is to strengthen one's own guardian spirit and to weaken the enemy's. In this respect hunting and fishing are much like warfare. The magic songs and formulas engage in the supernatural struggle and open the way, while the actual weapons do the work when the spiritual barriers are removed.

According to Boas (Kwakiutl Indians, Rep. U. S. Nat. Mus., 1895, 1897) the Tlingit, Haida, Tsimshian, Bellabella, and Kitamat have "animal totems in the proper sense of this term," but these tutelary guardians are not found among the Kwakiutl, who belong to the same linguistic stock as the Kitamat. This author states that the natives do not regard themselves as descendants of the "totem" or tutelary, and that the northern tribes of the coast Salish have no "animal totem in the restricted sense of this term." Boas was unable to obtain any information regarding the conjectured origin of the clan or gentile patron or tutelary, except the dubious light drawn from the native traditions, but states that these legends correspond in character "almost exactly to the tales of the acquisition of manitows among the eastern Indians, and they are evidence that the 'totem' of this group of tribes is, in the main, the hereditary manitow of a family." He also states that "each man among these tribes acquires a guardian spirit," but is restricted to only such as belongs to his clan. Native tradition can shed no satisfactory light on the question of the source and origin of the clan or gentile patron spirit.

Writing of the California Indians in general, Merriam (Am. Anthr., x, no. 4, 1908) says that these Indians believe that they "came from" certain animals, trees, or rocks. This belief, while agreeing in the main with that of the modern more or less acculturated Yuchi, is in strong contrast with the evidence on this point from E. and N. W. America, where apparently the peoples do not regard themselves as descendants of their clan or gentile patron spirits. Merriam remarks that "of the several degrees and phases of totemism, at least three occur in California, namely, (1) the non-hereditary individual totem; (2) the hereditary patriarchal totem; and (3) the hereditary matriarchal clan totem." He is also averse to the proposed restriction of the term "totemism" to "cases ordinarily known as clan totemism," for the reason that "clan totemism is so obviously only a higher development of personal totemism," deeming such restriction purposeless. But there is no proof that such a development of the personal tutelary rests on a basis of fact.

In the acquirement of the personal tutelary the Iroquois ritual does not contemplate the killing of the object seen in a vision or in a dream for the purpose of obtaining a part of it as a token, symbol, or a memento of it. So adversative to this practice of the Omaha and other tribes is the Iroquois procedure that some persons, who have seen a particular animal, regarded their own fate and destiny so closely connected with that of the tutelary animal that they measured the length of their own lives by that of their tutelary, believing that its death not only portended but also hastened their own. More fortunate did those regard themselves whose tutelary was some material object, imbued with life by the creative breath of myth, whose destruction was not so certain or so common as that of an animal or a bird. Thus it is seen how diverse are the dogmas and beliefs connected with the personal tutelary. Moreover, in the rites designed to obtain a personal tutelary for a youth, it was the duty of the father's clan, or phratry of clans, at the New Year ceremony of the Iroquois, to receive and to interpret the dream or vision, and to make of wood, bark, stone, or other material a symbol, token, or representation of the object divined from the dream or vision to be the tutelary of the youth, which is given the youth to keep and carefully preserve.

Kroeber (Ethnol. Gros Ventre, 147, 1908) writes that the Gros Ventres (Atsina) are organized into gentes similar to those of the Siksika (Blackfeet) and the Sioux, bearing nicknames which are in no way totemic; that descent is traced through the paternal line; that there is prohibition of marriage within each gens; and that the prohibition of marriage extends to members of the mother's gens, for the members of both the father's and the mother's gentes are regarded as related within the prohibited degrees of kinship. He also states that only some of the Gros Ventres seek to acquire a personal guardian spirit, that this is undertaken only after reaching manhood, and that not all those who make the attempt succeed. The attempt is made in the usual manner, by fasting and retreating to some secluded spot. The man killed the animal thus found, apparently for the purpose of obtaining parts of it for an emblem; afterward he would not kill or eat that kind of animal. A few women acquired guardian spirits, not while in retreat to some mountain, but only during absence from the camp.

Like that of the Yuchi, one of the cardinal doctrines of the Iroquoian and Algonquian mythic philosophy is that every kind of animal being has an elder brother, a primal being, wonderfully large and potent, which is, so to speak, the source of all the individuals of its own kind. These primal beings are the younger brothers of Teharonhiawagon of the Iroquois and of Nanabozho of the Algonquian tribes, respectively the impersonations of all the thousand forms of faunal and floral life on earth. He who sees one of these elder brothers of any kind of animal being will be successful in the succeeding hunt of that animal; for it is by the favor of these elder brothers of the game animals that the hunter obtains any measure of success in killing the younger brothers of the primal beings (Hewitt, Iroq. Cosmol., 21st Rep. B. A. E., 1903). For in fulfillment of engagements with Teharonhiawagon and Nanabozho in the second cosmic period, these elder brothers are in duty bound to provide man not only with protection but also with animal food by means of the sacrifice of their younger brothers who are enjoined to permit themselves to be taken by man, so long as the hunter makes himself ritualistically pure for the purpose and is solicitous not to kill his victims except with the least possible cruelty. For this reason prayers for successful hunting and fishing were addressed to the game it is desired to kill, a procedure naturally assumed to be pleasing to the ruling elder brother.

Long has declared that the favorite spirit must not be killed or eaten, but the Omaha must kill his personal tutelary before its tutelaryship is established. Conversely, there were some Iroquois who feared the death of the animal or bird which he regarded as his personal tutelary, lest he himself should also die. The ground that is common in these two methods is the manner of ascertaining or discovering the tutelary (through the rite of dreaming or seeing in vision) and in the motive for acquiring it, namely, the effort to obtain the favor of the imaginary bodies on which it was supposed human welfare largely depended. In the last analysis human welfare is the motive for acquiring a guardian or tutelary power or being. There are, of course, many ways of providing the means of entering into close relation with these supposed controlling powers of the sources of human well-being, and consequently there are many methods of establishing this interrelation between a person and some assumed protecting power, or between an organized body of persons and a guardian or patron being or power, for a specific or a general aid and auxiliary to the promotion and preservation of the well-being of the person or persons guarded. Totem Poles. Carved cedar poles erected by Indians along the N. Pacific coast from Vancouver id. to Alaska. Among the Haida they are of three principal varieties: the outside and inside house poles, and memorial columns. Besides the house poles the four main supporting posts and the two outside front corner posts were sometimes carved. The outside house pole, standing in front of the house midway between the corners, was 3 ft or more wide at the base and sometimes more than 50 ft high, being hollowed along the back for easier handling. Close to the base it was pierced with a round aperture which served as a door, though some of the later poles were left solid, a door of European pattern being made at one side. Inside house poles were erected only by the very wealthy. They stood in the middle of the house, directly behind the fire, and marked the seat of honor. Grave posts were of many different shapes. Sometimes they consisted of a very thick post surmounted by a large carved box, which contained smaller boxes holding the bones of the deceased; sometimes the box was longer and was supported by two posts. Oftentimes, however, the body of the deceased was placed in a mortuary house, and the pole, usually a tall, slender shaft, was erected elsewhere. The carvings on grave posts and grave boxes were almost always crests owned by the family of the deceased, while those on house poles might be crests or they might illustrate stories, and occasionally a figure of the house-owner himself was added, or the figure of some one whom he wished to ridicule. These posts were erected during the great feasts commonly known as potlaches, when an immense amount of property was given away and quantities of food were consumed. The trunks out of which they were to be carved were cut down, rolled into the water, and towed to the village amid songs and dancing. One or more regular carvers were employed to put on the designs and they were paid handsomely. (For specific descriptions see works cited below.) In comparatively modern times numbers of models of these poles have been made by native carvers to sell to white visitors. These are sometimes of wood, sometimes of a peculiar black slate found at one place not far from Skidegate, Queen Charlotte ids. According to native Haida accounts carved designs were originally made directly on the front slabs of the house, afterward on a broad, thick plank, and finally on poles. This comparatively modern evolution is corroborated by the Tlingit, who have only the grave post, upon which they carve representations of stories as well as crests. Tsimshian posts were more slender than those put up by the Haida, but the ones erected in front of Kwakiutl houses are usually much more slender still, and all are heraldic, referring to the tradition of the house-owner. The main supporting posts bear crests or record an episode connected with the building of the house. The main posts which support the houses of the Nootka and the coast Salish, when carved at all, represented an event that happened to the owner, such as the acquiring of a guardian spirit, or an event in the history of his sept. Some eastern tribes, such as the Creeks, Delawares, Shawnee, and Iroquois, set up small poles that are analogous to these totem poles, although the outward resemblance is slight. Those of the Delawares and Shawnee were erected in the four corners of their medicine-lodges, while those of the Iroquois were similarly placed in the houses of shamans and were adorned with representations of the shamans' tutelary spirits.

Totero. The settlement of the Tutelo (q. v.), in the middle of the 18th century, on Meherrin r., Va. According to Catesby (Nat. Hist. Car., II, xi, 1743) "the houses were built with strong posts or trees drove into the ground close to one another, the interstices being stopped up with moss, and covered with the bark of the sweet-gum tree."

Totheet. A Massachusetts village in 1614, on the n. shore of Plymouth co., Mass.

Totiakton ('it is a bend of the stream'). The large palisaded western "castle" of the Seneca tribe, situated in the 17th century on the Honeoye outlet, not far from Honeoye Falls, in Monroe co., N. Y. This castle was the residence of the noted Seneca federal chief Shadegaronhies, representing the fourth and last brotherhood of Seneca federal chiefs. The castle was sometimes known by his name. In 1687 it was, with the three others, destroyed by Denonville and was not rebuilt, as the Seneca thereafter retired eastward, westward, and southward, establishing their villages in the Genessee valley and in the vicinity of Canandaigua lake.

Totopotomoi. Principal chief of the Pamunkey Indians (q. v.) of Virginia about 1650. He seems to have been the second in succession from Opechanough (q. v.), the last chief of the confederated Powhatan tribes, slain by the English in 1644. In 1656 he joined the Virginia forces with nearly 100 warriors to repel an invasion by the inland tribes, but in a bloody engagement on James r., near the present Richmond, the Virginians were defeated, and Totopotomoi, with nearly all of his warriors, was killed. So bitter was the feeling against the commander, Col. Edward Hill, for the disastrous result, that he was deprived of all official position and his property confiscated to pay the expenses of the expedition.

Totopotomoi was survived by his widow, Queen Anne (q. v.), who held a prominent place in Virginia Indian history for 40 years. He figures also in Butler's satire Hudibras. Totopotomoy cr., Va., takes its name from him. (J. M.)

Totstalahoeetska. A former Seminole town on the w. side of Tampa bay, Fla. Its population was made up chiefly of Upper Creeks who fled there after the war of 1813-14.

Totstalahoeetska.—Bell in Morse, Rep. to Sec. War, 306, 1822. Watermelon Town.—Ibid.

Totuskey. A division of the Powhatan confederacy, comprising the Moraughta-cund and Secacawoni tribes, in Virginia. In 1608 the two tribes numbered 180 warriors, while 60 years later they were reduced to 70 warriors.

Totuskeys.—Jefferson, Notes, 138, 1801.

Touaguainchain. A Huron village in Ontario in 1615 (Champlain, 1615, Œuvres, iv, 28, 1870). A note by the editor of Champlain suggests that it may have been the Sainte Madeleine of the Jesuit Relation of 1640.

Touchonasintons ('village of the pole'). A band of western Dakota, perhaps the Wazikute of the Yanktonai.

Touchonasintons.—Shea, Early Voy., 111, 1861. Touchonasintons.—Le Sueur (1700) quoted by Neill, Hist. Minn., 170, 1858.

Touenho. A former Onondaga hamlet, situated in 1688 s. of Brewerton, which is at the w. end of L. Oneida, N. Y.

Goienho.—Jes. Rel. 1656, 12, 1858 (given as the name of L. Oneida, but "it has been mentioned and probably belonged to Brewerton."—Beauchamp). Tou-en'-ho.—Beauchamp, Aborig. Place Names, 153, 1907.

Tougoulas (interpreted by Gatschet as from Choctaw iti, 'forest'; ókla, 'people': 'forest people', but more likely 'Tious people'). One of the 9 Natchez villages at the close of the 17th century. —Iberville in Margry, Déc., iv, 179, 1880.

Touladi. The great lake-trout (Salvelinus namaycush), called by the French Canadians queue-fourchue; a word written also tuladi, in use among the fishermen and settlers, French and English, of E. Quebec. According to Chambers (The Ouananiche, 270, 1896) touladi is the name of this fish in the Micmac and Abnaki dialects of Algonquian. (A. F. C.)

Toulibi. See Tulibee.

Toupa. A chief or tribe in alliance with the chief of Audusta (Edisto), S. C., and in friendly relations with the French in 1562. The name is indicated as that of a village, inland from Port Royal, on the De Bry map of 1591 (Le Moyne Narr., Appleton trans., 1875).

Touppa.—Laudonnière (1562) in French, Hist. Coll. La., n. s., 201, 1869.

Touraxouslins. Mentioned by Tonti (French, Hist. Coll. La., i, 82, 1846), in connection with the Kickapoo, as a tribe living apparently in Illinois, about the head of Illinois r., in 1690. Possibly the Mascontens.

Tourima. One of the early Quapaw villages, situated on the w. bank of the Mississippi, probably near the mouth of the Arkansas. It is stated by more than one authority that the people of this village and of Tongigua were at least for a time united in one village. Father Poisson (1720) places all the villages on Arkansas r. When the Quapaw migrated they applied the old names to their new settlements, even when they finally settled on their reservation in the present Oklahoma.

To-ua-qua.—Bandelier in Arch. Inst. Papers, iv, 207, 1892. To-wa-kwá.—Hodge, field-notes, B. A. E., 1895.

Towalt. A local name of a species of salmon (Salmo confluentus) found in the waters of Puget sd. and elsewhere on the n. w. Pacific coast; from towallin, the name of this fish in the Nisqually dialect of the Salish language. (A. F. C.)

Towayat's Village. A summer camp of a Stikine chief named Toyā't, on Etolin id., Alaska; pop. 82 in 1880.—Petroff in Tenth Census, Alaska, 32, 1884.

Towerquotton. One of the southernmost Tillamook villages in 1805, on a creek emptying into Tillamook bay, Oreg. The name was really that of the chief (Lewis and Clark Exped., II, 117, 1814).

Towha ('coyote'). An extinct clan of Taos pueblo, N. Mex.

Tówha tai'na.—M. C. Stevenson, notes, B. A. E., 1910 (tai'na='people').

Towhayu ('fighting coyote'). An extinct clan of Taos pueblo, N. Mex.

Tówhayu tai'na.—M. C. Stevenson, notes, B. A. E., 1910 (tai'na='people').

Town-band Indians. A former Dakota band, probably of the Mdewakanton.—McLeod (1852) in Sen. Ex. Doc. 29, 32d Cong., 2d sess., 11, 1853.

Toxaway (Dúksa'i, or Dúkw'sa'i, of unknown meaning). A former Cherokee settlement in South Carolina, on a creek of the same name, a head-stream of Keowee r., having its source in Jackson co., N. C. The name has been wrongly interpreted to mean 'place of shedding tears.' (J. M.)

Taxawaw.—Royce in 5th Rep., B. A. E., map, 1887.

Tosawa.—Doc. of 1755 cited by Royce, ibid., 148.

Toxaway.—Mooney in 19th Rep. B. A. E., 516, 1900 (common name).

Toybipet. A Gabrieleño rancheria formerly in Los Angeles co., Cal., at a locality later called San José.

Sibapot.—Latham in Proc. Philol. Soc. Lond., VI, 76, 1854 (probably identical). Toibi.—Kroeber in Univ. Cal. Pub., Am. Arch. and Eth., VIII, 39, 1908 (native name). Toybipet.—Ried quoted by Taylor in Cal. Farmer, June 8, 1860.

Toys. Indian children do not differ from the children of other races in their fondness for toys, and it is found that among them toys adapted to all the periods from infancy to adolescence were in common use. The psychology of toys involves reactions between the child mind and the adult mind in great variety, and sex, age, social stage, and environment are factors for differentiation. Three classes of toys may be distinguished: (1) Those for attracting, soothing, and amusing infants; (2) those invented or appropriated by children for their own use; (3) those supplied by adults from educational, religious, or esthetic motives. Examples of the first class are the infant's rattle and attractive objects hung on the cradle bow; of the second, clay figures, bits of wood or stone or rags, or the like, treasured by children and idealized in their imagination. Dolls and their appurtenances, cradles, and miniature implements are educative for future occupations, and representations of spiritual beings, such as the tihus or dolls of the Hopi and Zuñi, and other cult objects and fetishes, impress religious ideas. Purely esthetic toys are extremely rare. In many cases children's toys are cult objects that were once sacred and esoteric, surviving for play, e. g., the bull-roarer (q. v.).

A greater variety of toys is observed among the Eskimo than among any other of the American aborigines. Nelson enumerates sleds, boats, hunting outfits, bows and arrows, dolls, models of dishes and other things, tops, ingenious mechanical toys simulating the movements of animals, and carved figures of ducks, seals, etc. Murdoch names dolls, kaiaks, imitation implements, whirligigs, teetotums, buzzes, whizzing-sticks, and pebble-snap-pers. Turner figures various dolls from Labrador. The doll is a favorite toy of Eskimo children, and great numbers of them are carved from ivory, wood, and stone. They are often provided with fur clothing, bedding, lamps, etc. In ethnographic collections there are few toys from the tribes of the United States, probably because collectors thought them unimportant, though from the Pueblos there is a good representation. Plains children, however, possessed dolls, sleds, clay figures of animals, clay blocks for building, tops, balls for bowling and for games like those of their elders, and a multitude of small utensils which imitate those used by adults. Zuñi and Hopi children have toy cradles, drums, bows, rattles, dishes, house-models, dolls, tops, pea-shooters, mechanical birds, grotesques in pottery, etc. The Mohave make bizarre dolls of pottery or willow bast. Rude dishes, figures of animals, etc., formed evidently by children, are frequently encountered in the Pueblo ruins of the S. W. See Child life, Games, Dolls.

Tozikakat ('mouth of Tozi river'). A Tenankutchin village on the N. bank of the Yukon, at the mouth of Tozi r., Alaska.—Petroff in 10th Census, Alaska, map, 1884.

Trachite. An eruptive rock, usually of light grayish hues and of medium hardness, used to a limited extent by the aborigines in the manufacture of implements. (W. H. H.)

Track Rock. A name, which should properly be in the plural, applied to a group of about half a dozen micaceous sandstone rocks, covered with petroglyphs presumably of Indian origin, on both sides of the trail crossing over Track Rock gap, about 5 m. E. of Blairsville, Union co., Ga. It is in the old country of the Cherokee, who call the locality by names which mean "Where there are tracks," or "Branded place." The carvings are of various patterns, some of them resembling human or animal footprints, "turkey tracks," circles, etc., disposed without any apparent order or purpose. The Cherokee have no definite idea of their origin or meaning, and it is probable that they were made at various times by wandering hunters for their own amusement while resting in the gap. The wonderful description given by Stevenson in 1834 and copied without investigation by White (Hist. Coll. Ga., 1855) and Jones (Antiq. Southern Inds., 1873) is greatly exaggerated. For description, illustration, and Indian myths, consult Mooney, Myths of the Cherokee, 19th Rep. B. A. E. See also Footprint sculptures, Pictographs. (J. M.)

Trade language. See Chinook jargon, Comanche, Mobilian, Sign language.

Trading posts. The earliest trade between Europeans and the Indians N. of Mexico was through the Basque people. These daring sailors by following the whale reached the fishing banks of Newfoundland at an early period. In 1497 Cabot touched upon that island and noted its "bigge fysshe." He was told by the natives that they were called baccalaos, the Basque for 'codfish,' and he gave that name to Canada. The word still lingers in Newfoundland as the designation of an island north of Conception bay. When Bretons, Normans, Portuguese, Spaniards, and Englishmen made their way to these fisheries, the Basques, who preceded them, had to a degree familiarized the natives with their tongue, and Basque words became a part of the trade jargon that came into use. Cartier, in 1534-35, found the natives of the gulf and river of St. Lawrence familiar with the European fur trade, and certain places on that stream were known to both races as points for the drying of fish and the trading of furs. The traffic spread to the southward, and from a letter of Pedro Menendez to Philip II it is learned that in 1565 and for some years earlier "bison skins were brought down the Potomac and thence carried along shore in canoes to the French about the Gulf of St. Lawrence. During two years 6,000 skins were thus obtained." The first trading post in 1603 was at Tadoussac, on the St. Lawrence at the mouth of the Saguenay; five years later Quebec was founded, and in 1611 Montreal was made the trading post for all the region westward. The earliest English post was with the colony on James r., Va., where pelts and corn were traded, and in 1614, when some needy tribes came to purchase maize, Sir Thomas Dale took, in repayment thereof, "a mortgage of their whole countries." In 1615, six years after the navigation by Hudson of the river which bears his name, the Dutch built a large post at Albany. For the next 50 years the eastern colonies made no special attempt to penetrate the interior of the continent, but in 1673 Canada authorized the movement by which the priest Marquette and the trader Joliet discovered the Mississippi. Meanwhile individual traders had traveled beyond the Great Lakes, and Groseilliers and Radisson, French traders, had found that Hudson bay could be reached overland. The failure of the French Government to award to these men the right to trade and to establish a post on the bay caused them to apply to England, in which they were successful, and in 1668 Ft. Charles was built at the southeastern extremity of Hudson bay. The success of this post led to the formation of the monopoly called "The Governor and Company of Adventurers of England trading into Hudson's Bay." Their successors, a hundred years later, in 1670, were incorporated by royal charter as The Hudson's Bay Company, with "absolute proprietorship, supreme jurisdiction in civil and military affairs, to make laws, and to declare war against pagan peoples." For more than half a century the posts of this company controlled the trade and administered whatever of law there existed in the vast regions N. and W. of the Lakes to the Pacific. In 1685 La Salle landed on the coast of Texas, opening the way for French trading enterprises on the lower Mississippi and its tributaries, and for the establishment of colonies in that region under the control of commanders of the posts. French trade during the 17th and 18th centuries developed a class of men known as courreurs des bois, who made themselves at home with the natives. These were the advance guard of civilization, and later served as interpreters, clerks, etc., to the Hudson's Bay, Northwest, American Fur, and other less important companies engaged in Indian trade up to the middle of the 19th century.

The trading post was generally a large square inclosed by a stockade; diagonally at two corners were turrets, with openings for small cannon and rifles in each turret so as to defend two sides of the wall. Within the stockade were the storehouses, quarters for the men, and a room for general trade.

In Virginia beads early became the "current coin" in trade with the Indians, and in 1621 Capt. Norton was sent over with some Italian workmen to establish a glass furnace for the manufacture of these articles. In 1640 and 1643 wampum (q. v.) was made legal tender in New England and was extensively used in trading with the Indians. During the next century trade was mostly by barter or in the currency of the colonies or the Government. The employment of liquor to stimulate trade began with the earliest venture and was more and more used as trade increased. The earnest protests of Indian chiefs and leaders and of philanthropic persons of the white race were of no avail, and not until the United States Government prohibited the sale of intoxicants was there any stay to the demoralizing custom. Smuggling of alcohol was resorted to, for the companies declared that "without liquor we can not compete in trade." To protect the Indians from the evil effects of intoxicants and to insure them a fair return for their pelts, at the suggestion of President Washington, the act of Apr. 18, 1796, authorized the establishment of trading houses under the immediate direction of the President. In 1806 the office of Superintendent of Indian Trade was created, with headquarters at Georgetown, D. C. In 1810 the following list of trading houses was furnished the chairman of the Senate committee on Indian Affairs: "At Coleraine, on the river St Marys, Ga.; at Tellico blockhouse, Southwestern territory; at Ft St Stevens, on the Mobile, Mississippi T.; at Chickasaw Bluffs, on the Mississippi, Mississippi T.; at Ft Wayne, on the Miami of the Lakes, Indiana T.; at Detroit, Michigan T.; at Akansas, on the river Akansas, Louisiana T.; at Nachitoches, on the Red r., Orleans T.; at Belle Fontaine, mouth of the Missouri, Louisiana T.; at Chicago, on L. Michigan, Indiana T.; at Sandusky, L. Erie, Ohio; at the island of Michilimackinac, L. Huron, Michigan T.; at Ft Osage, on the Missouri, Louisiana T.; at Ft Madison, on the upper Mississippi, Louisiana T." At that time there were few factories in the country where goods required for the Indian trade could be made, and as the Government houses were restricted to articles of domestic manufacture their trade was at a disadvantage, notwithstanding their goods were offered at about cost price, for the Indian preferred the better quality of English cloth and the surreptitiously supplied liquor. Finally the opposition of private traders secured the passage of the act of May 6, 1822, abolishing the Government trading houses, and thus "a system fraught with possibilities of great good to the Indian" came to an end. The official records show that until near the close of its career, in spite of the obstacles it had to contend with and the losses growing out of the War of 1812, the Government trade was self-sustaining. From colonial days and until the decline of the fur trade, near the middle of the 19th century, wars, in which both Indians and the white race were implicated, were fomented by the rivalry of competing traders. Posts were scattered along the rivers from the Great Lakes to the Pacific. Montreal and St

Louis were the two great outfitting centers, as well as the distributing markets for the furs. Where Kansas City now stands the traders bound up the Missouri by boat and those who were going overland parted company. Here the great Oregon trail started and stretched, a brown ribbon, across hundreds of miles of prairie. Forty-one m. to the westward, near the present town of Gardner, Kans., this trail branched to Santa Fé, where trade was maintained with the Pueblos and other Indians of the S. W. A sign-board set up at the parting of the trail indicated the long western branch as the "Road to Oregon." Along this historic trail trading posts were located, to which white and Indian trappers and hunters from the surrounding region brought their pelts. Fts Laramie, Bridger, Hall, Boisé, Wallawalla, Vancouver, and Astoria have now become cities. So also have the principal posts along the lakes and rivers, Detroit, Prairie du Chien, Council Bluffs, Pierre, Mandan, Spokane, Winnipeg, and many others, all of which are now centers of rich agricultural regions. In recent years steps have been taken to mark some of the old routes with suitable monuments. See also Commerce, Fur trade, Trails and Trade routes.

Trails and Trade routes. All early accounts indicate that from a period long prior to the coming of the whites the Indian was familiar with places often hundreds of miles distant one from another, and that they traveled over the same route in coming and going. The trader was inclined to follow the water courses, unloading his boat to pass obstructions and transporting the canoe and its cargo over short distances, called portages or carries, between different waters. Supplemental, however, to these open and in time of war obviously dangerous routes, were paths or trails, many of them originally made by the tracks of deer or buffalo in their seasonal migrations between feeding grounds or in search of water or salt licks. The constant passing over the same path year after year and generation after generation often so packed the soil that in places, especially on hillsides, the paths are still traceable by depressions in the ground or by the absence of or the difference in vegetation. Many of them have been obliterated by the roads and railways of modern times. The Jesuit Relations (1658) indicate the several routes followed from the St Lawrence and the Great Lakes to Hudson bay for trade, hunting, or fishing; one of these is mentioned as having extended a distance of 250 leagues. Many maps of the colonial period, supplemented by other records, indicate that these ways of communication extended with few breaks practically the entire length and breadth of the continent. While the streams answered in certain instances as suitable routes of travel, at times they had their drawbacks, owing to snags, freshets, or when the channel approached close to the shore, thus exposing persons in boats or on rafts to attack from enemies concealed in the vegetation along the banks. In many instances distant points were connected by trails, or traces, the latter word adopted from early French maps. Owing to the Indian habit of marching in single file, the Eastern trails seldom exceeded 18 in. in width, yet these were the ordinary roads of the country traveled by hunters, migrating bands, traders, embassies, and war parties. So long as the trails led through friendly territory, they followed the lines of least natural resistance. War parties after leaving friendly territory passed into the wilderness over routes selected by scouts, which routes they followed by significant marks, natural or artificial. In some places the paths of wild beasts were followed, in others the beds of streams were chosen, so that the footprints of the party would be obliterated. Other things being equal, the trail was not laid out along rough, stony ground, because of the rapid wearing away of footgear; nor through green-brier, nor dense brush, nor laurel or other thickets, because of the difficulty of making rapid progress. These trails were generally along high ground, where the soil dried quickly, where the underbrush was least dense, where the fewest and shallowest streams were to be crossed; and on journeys where mountains were encountered, the paths, with few exceptions, followed the lowest points, or gaps, in many of which stone piles are found. In the extreme S. W. these stone heaps have resulted from the Indians casting a stone when approaching a steep ascent, in order, they say, to prevent them from becoming fatigued. The numerous and wide watercourses and the dense forest growth along the coast of New England made progress on foot almost impossible; consequently the birch-bark canoe was almost the only means of conveying the natives and their goods from point to point. Farther s. the dug-out canoe was of such weight as to make any but the shortest carries most difficult. In the Middle states the country is more open and freer from underbrush, and the use of paths became a matter of necessity. Along the N. W. coast travel was along the beach or off shore in canoes. In the E. trails consisted of footpaths, whereas those of the plains in later times were wide roads beaten down by large parties passing with horses, dragging tipi poles and travois. These trails were well marked, often being depressed 2 ft below the surface, the difference in vegetable growth along them showing distinctly for many years where the path had been. In the S. W. there were long trails by which the Hopi and other Pueblo Indians traveled to and from the sources of supply of salt from the Colorado r. and elsewhere; long journeys were also made to obtain supplies of shells or turquoise for ornaments, clay for pottery, or stone to answer the requirements of trade or domestic use. The Iroquois of central New York were familiar with the country as far w. as the Black hills of Dakota, whence they returned with prisoners; the same Indians went from New York to South Carolina to attack the Catawba and into Florida against the Creeks. Western Indians traveled hundreds of miles to obtain blankets from the Pueblos, and some Plains Indians are known to have traveled 2,000 m. on raids. The Santa Fé trail and the Oregon trail were well-known routes whose beginning was Independence, Mo., one ending in New Mexico, the other at the Willamette. On early maps many Indian trails and trade routes are indicated, some along the streams and others across country. The route from Montreal up the Ottawa to L. Huron and Green bay may readily be traced; or from Montreal down to the Richelieu, up the latter, through L. Champlain into L. George, and by a portage to the Hudson. Another route went across country from Albany, on the Hudson, to Rochester and Buffalo on the lakes. Farther s. was the "trading" path from Richmond to the Cherokee country. Two roads led to the W., one down the Ohio, the other through the Wilderness by way of Cumberland gap. The great highway leading from Cumberland gap to the mouth of the Scioto was known as the Warriors' Path. The road from Philadelphia to Kentucky by Cumberland gap was nearly 800 m. in length. Daniel Boone crossed the mountains by following up the Yadkin to its headwaters, thence down the mountains by easy grade to the W. The Indian road, by the treaty of Lancaster, ran from the Yadkin, crossed the headwaters of the James, thence down the Shenandoah, across the Potomac, thence to Philadelphia by way of York and Lancaster, a distance of 435 m. No wagon passed by the Wilderness road, which extended westward through Kentucky, Indiana, and Illinois, before 1795. The white man, whether hunter, trader, or settler, blazed the trees along the Indian trails in order that seasonal changes might not mislead him should he return. The winter trails of the N. were over the frozen rivers or lakes or along paths made by snowshoes and sleds, which packed the snow solidly. These trails of the Indians, first followed by the trapper and trader, were later used by the missionary, the hunter, the soldier, and the colonist in their conquest of the wilderness. Traps. Although devices for inducing animals to effect self-imprisonment, self-arrest, or suicide differ from hunting weapons in that the victim is the active agent, the two classes merge into each other. The Indians had land, water, and air traps, and these acted by tension, ratchet, gravity, spring, point, or blade. They were self-set, ever-set, victim-set, or man-set, and were released, when necessary, either by the hunter out of sight or by the victim. The following list embraces all varieties of traps used by Indians n. of Mexico, and they were very clever in making them effective without the use of metal: A. Inclosing traps: (a) pen, (b) cage, (c) pit, (d) door; B. Arresting traps: (e) meshes, (f) hooks, (g) nooses, (h) clutches; C. Killing traps: (i) weights, (k) piercers, (l) knives. Pen traps were of the simplest kinds—dams placed in the water or stockades on land. Some of these were immense, covering many square miles. The cage was merely a pen for flying creatures. Doors or gates for this whole class were vertical shutters sliding between stakes and set free by some kind of latch or trigger. Arresting traps were all designed to take the place of the human hand. Meshes were the opened fingers; hooks, the bent forefinger; nooses, the encircling closed fingers; the clutch, the grasping hand. Killing traps were weapons acting automatically. They were complex, consisting of the working part and the mechanism of setting and release. The Eskimo and Indian devices were of the simplest character, but very effective with unwary game. The victim was caught in a pound, deadfall, cage, hole, box, toil, noose, or jaw; or upon a hook, gorge, pale, knife, or the like.

ESKIMO WOLF TRAP. (NELSON)

The Indian placed an unstable prop, catch, or fastening, to be released in passing, curiously prying, gnawing, rubbing, or even in digesting, as when the Eskimo doubled up a skewer of baleen, inclosed in frozen fat, and threw it in the snow for the bear to swallow. Inclosing traps were common on land and in waters abounding in fish. Parry describes traps of ice with doors of the same material. The tribes of California and of the plains dug pits and covered them with brush on which a dead rabbit was tied, and the hunter concealed beneath grasped the bird by the feet, dragged it below, and crushed it between his knees. Arresting traps were most common, working by meshes, barbs, nooses, or by means of manual seizure. The aborigines were familiar with the gill net, trawl lines, gorge hook, snares, springs, trawl snares, and birdlime. Killing traps included ice, stone, and log deadfalls for crushing, impaling devices, and set knives for braining or for inciting mutual slaughter, the object of perhaps the most ingenious and efficient of Indian traps, consisting of a sharp blade inclosed in frozen fat, which was set up in the path of wolves. When a wolf in licking the fat cut its tongue the smell of blood infuriated the whole pack and drove them to destroy one another. See Fishing, Hunting.

Travel. The North American Indian had poor facilities for getting about on land. The Arctic peoples, however, with their sleds and dogs, may be said to have been pioneers of fast travel. Of such great and universal use was this method of locomotion among them that before their language became differentiated into dialects that rendered them unintelligible one to another they had covered the entire Arctic coast from E. Greenland to Siberia. The Algonquian tribes of northern Canada, together with the Athapascans in the Mackenzie r. country, also used the dog and sled for transportation and travel. South of this region the tribes had everywhere to walk until the Spaniard introduced the horse. The Indians were not discouraged by the lack of beasts of burden. They had covered the entire continent with a network of trails, over which they ran long distances with phenomenal speed and endurance; the Tarahumare mail carrier from Chihuahua to Batopilas, Mexico, runs regularly more than 500 m. a week; a Hopi messenger has been known to run 120 m. in 15 hours, and there are many instances of journeys extending over months or years, involving great hardship. It is most probable that the narrow highways alluded to were first laid down in the food quest. The animals that were wanted knew where were the best feeding grounds and supplies of water, and the Indians had only to follow the paths already made by the game to establish the earliest roads. Hulbert in his "Historic Highways of America" traces the trails followed by the Indians in their migrations and their ordinary trade routes, especially those of the mound-builders, and he gives lists, especially of the trails in the Ohio valley, where these mounds were most abundant. The range of the buffalo afforded especially favorable routes. The portages across country between the watersheds of the different rivers became beaten paths. The Athapascan Indians were noted travelers; so also were the Siouan and other tribes of the Great Plains, and to a smaller degree the Muskogean, while the Algonquian tribes journeyed from the extreme E. of the United States to Montana in the W., and from the headwaters of the Saskatchewan to the Gulf of Mexico. Evidences of such movements are found in the ancient graves, as copper from L. Michigan, shells from the Atlantic ocean and the Gulf of Mexico, and stone implements from various quarters. Pipes of catlinite (q. v.) are widely distributed in the graves and mounds. These articles show that active trade was going on over a wide region. There is good evidence that the men engaged in this trade had certain immunities and privileges, in so far as the pipestone quarry was on once neutral ground. They were free from attack, and were allowed to go from one tribe to another unimpeded. See Boats, Commerce, Fur trade, Sledges, Snow-shoes, Trails and Trade Routes, Travels.

Travois. A sort of sledge or litter, drawn by a single dog or horse, formerly in common use among the Plains tribes. The name, usually pronounced trar-oy, is the

DAKOTA TRAVOIS

French Canadian term for the shafts of a vehicle, and is a derivation from the older Latin word signifying a brake or shackle. The travois was sometimes specially constructed for the purpose, particularly in the case of the smaller ones intended to be drawn by dogs, but was more frequently a temporary combination of tipi poles and tipi cover while moving camp. When it had been decided to move, and the tipis had been taken down, the poles of each tipi were tied into 2 bunches of about 10 poles each by means of rawhide ropes passed through holes already bored for the purpose through their upper ends. These were then bound on each side of the horse with a rope passing in front of the saddle in such a way that the upper ends of the poles rested about the animal's shoulders while the lower ends trailed on the ground behind. The tipi cover was folded into a compact bundle and tied over the poles behind the horse, thus forming a litter upon which other household belongings, including sometimes the old people and children, were placed, to the limit of the animal's capacity. When the party reached its destination, the load was unpacked and the tipi again set up.

For special occasions a drag litter was constructed in the same fashion, with two poles for side pieces, supporting the central rest, which was either a piece of rawhide suspended between the poles by means of a rope passed through holes along the edge, or sometimes a netting of rawhide ropes stretched within a circular hoop or frame. By reason of its springiness this contrivance was more comfortable for riding than the other, and was therefore used for transporting sick or aged people, children, and even young puppies. A rounded top to keep off sun or rain was sometimes woven from willow rods, and when used for transporting small children this top was made to form a complete dome-shaped cage, with a doorway which was securely closed after the children had been put inside. The cage travois for carrying puppies was of similar pattern, but smaller, and was usually drawn by the mother of the puppies herself. The travois, drawn by dogs, is mentioned as early as the narratives of Coronado's expedition in 1540-42 (14th Rep. B. A. E., 1896). In modified form it has been proposed for army field use in transporting wounded. (J. M.)

Trays. See Receptacles.

Trea. Mentioned by Oñate in 1598 (Doc. Inéd., xvi, 114, 1871) as a pueblo of the Jemez (q. v.) in New Mexico. It can not be identified with the present native name of any of the ruined settlements in the vicinity of Jemez. In Oñate's second list (ibid., 102) Fiapuzi is mentioned. A comparison of the lists shows the latter name to be a misprinted combination of "Trea" and "guati," the latter being the first part of the name of the next pueblo mentioned (Guatitriti). A similar error occurs in the name Mecastria in the same list. (F. W. H.)

Treaties. The political status of the Indians residing within the territorial limits of the United States has been changed in one important respect by official action. From the formation of the Government to Mar. 3, 1871, the relations with the Indians were determined by treaties made with their tribal authorities; but by act of Congress of the date named the legal fiction of recognizing the tribes as independent nations with which the United States could enter into solemn treaties was finally set aside after it had continued for nearly a century. The effect of this act was to bring under the immediate control of Congress the relations of the Government with the Indians and to reduce to simple agreements what had before been accomplished by treaties as with a foreign power. Why the Government, although claiming complete sovereignty over the territory and inhabitants within its domain, adopted the method of dealing with the Indians through treaties, which in the true legal sense of the term can only be entered into by independent sovereignties, may be briefly stated:

The first step of the Government in determining its policy toward the Indians, whether expressed or implied, was to decide as to the nature of their territorial rights, this being the chief factor in their relations with the whites. This decision is distinctly stated by the United States Supreme Court in the case of Johnson and Graham's lessee v. McIntosh (8 Wheaton, 453), as follows: "It has never been contended that the Indian title amounted to nothing. Their right of possession has never been questioned. The claim of the Government extends to the complete, ultimate title, charged with the right of possession, and to the exclusive power of acquiring this right," which has been subsequently confirmed by repeated decisions of the court. The next step was to determine the branch of the Government to carry out this policy. By the 9th article of the Articles of Confederation it was declared that "the United States in Congress assembled have the sole and exclusive right and power of regulating the trade and managing all affairs with the Indians not members of any of the states." It is clear, therefore, that while acting under the Articles of Confederation the right of managing relations with the Indians was vested in Congress alone. In the formation of the Constitution this is briefly expressed under the powers of the legislative department, as follows: "To regulate commerce with foreign nations and among the several states, and with the Indian tribes."

It is apparent, from the use of the term "tribes," that the framers of the Constitution had in contemplation the method of dealing with the Indians as tribes through treaties. This is clearly shown by the act of Mar. 1, 1793, in which it is stated that no purchase or grant of lands shall be of any validity "unless the same be made by a treaty or convention entered into pursuant to the Constitution." This action of Congress necessarily placed the initiatory steps in dealing with the Indians under the jurisdiction of the President as the treaty-making power, subject to confirmation by the Senate.

The colonies and also the mother country had treated with the Indians as "nations," their chiefs or sachems often being designated "kings," and this idea, being retained by the founders of our Government, was ingrafted into their policy. Notwithstanding the evident anomaly of such course, this implied equality was recognized in the dealings between the two until the act of Mar. 3, 1871. During all this time Indian titles to lands were extinguished only under the treaty-making clause of the Constitution; and these treaties, though the tribe may have been reduced to a small band, were usually clothed in the same stately verbiage as the most important treaty with a great European power. From the execution of the first treaty between the United States and the Indians arising from the sale of the land vacated. The right of Congress to abrogate a treaty made with the Indians when public necessity or their own welfare required it, has been asserted by the United States Supreme Court, and this right has been exercised in one or two instances, as in the case of the treaties with the Sisseton and Wahpeton Sioux by act of Feb. 16, 1863, and that of Lone Wolf v. Hitchcock, Sec. Int., in 1903. It was stated by the Indian Office as early as 1890 that the Indian title to all the public domain had then been extinguished, except in Alaska, the portion included in 162 reservations, and the lands acquired by the Indians through purchase. As the title to reservations is derived in most cases from the United

PENN. TREATING WITH THE INDIANS AT SHACKAMONK, PA., IN 1662. (FROM A PAINTING BY BENJAMIN WEST OWNED BY THE HISTORICAL SOCIETY OF PENNSYLVANIA.)

States and the Indian tribes residing within its limits (Sept. 17, 1778, with the Delaware) to the act of Mar. 3, 1871, the Government pursued a uniform course of extinguishing the Indian title only with the consent of those tribes which were recognized as having claim to the soil by virtue of occupancy, and of settling other affairs with the Indians by means of treaties signed by both parties. Excepting in the case of the Creeks at the close of the Creek war, in 1814, and in that of the Sioux in Minnesota after the outbreak of 1862, the Government has never extinguished an Indian title by right of conquest, and in those cases the Indians were provided with other reservations and were subsequently paid the net proceeds States, and title by purchase directly or indirectly from the same source, it may be stated that title to all the public domain except in Alaska had practically been extinguished by treaties previous to Mar. 3, 1871, and by agreements between that date and 1890.

As the dealings with Indians regarding lands constitute the most important transactions with which the Government has been concerned and those to which most of the treaties relate, the Indian policy of the United States is most clearly shown thereby. By some of the European governments having American colonies—as, for example, Spain—the Indian claim was recognized only to so much land as was occupied or in use, but it has been usual for the United States to allow it to extend to the territory claimed, where the boundaries were recognized and acknowledged by the surrounding tribes. It would seem, in fact, that the United States proceeded on the theory that all the lands within their territorial bounds were held by the natives, and hence that the possessory right of the Indians thereto must be extinguished. The only variation from this rule was in the case of the Uinta Ute, where an omitted portion of their claimed territory was taken possession of (18th Rep. B. A. E., pt. II, 824, 1900). From the formation of the Government to Mar. 3, 1871, there were entered into 371 treaties with the Indians, including the Ft Laramie treaty of Sept. 17, 1851, with the Sioux, Assiniboin, Blackfeet, et al., which never appeared in the statutes, although acted on and subsequently recognized. This treaty, however, was printed in the Laws and Treaties of 1883 and 1903. The treaty of Sept. 23, 1806 (at the mouth of St Peters or Minnesota r.), with the Sioux, was also not printed in the statutes, though ratified by the Senate, and was never proclaimed by the President (see Compilation of Treaties, 1903, p. 793). The following list of the 370 treaties (that of Ft Laramie in 1851 being omitted) was published by the Indian Office in 1903:

Since the act of Mar. 3, 1871, the dealings with the Indians, except in cases in which the President has been empowered to act, have been by agreements. To Mar. 21, 1902, these have numbered 74. Previous to the Declaration of Independence treaties were made with the Indians by the individual colonies and also by Great Britain. The New England colonies, and Pennsylvania, New Jersey, Maryland, and Virginia seem to have treated directly and independently of the mother country; while treaties with the Indians of New York, the Carolinas, and Georgia were made partly by the colonies and partly by the agents of the British government. Under the Articles of Confederation the right of treating with the Indians was clearly reserved to the respective states in which the Indians resided, but under the Constitution the party with whom this right remained has been a subject of dispute, although theoretically the right seems to have remained with the 13 original states until transferred by them to the United States.

Tribe. Among the North American Indians a tribe is a body of persons who are bound together by ties of consanguinity and affinity and by certain esoteric ideas or concepts derived from their philosophy concerning the genesis and preservation of the environing cosmos, and who by means of these kinship ties are thus socially, politically, and religiously organized through a variety of ritualistic, governmental, and other institutions, and who dwell together occupying a definite territorial area, and who speak a common language or dialect. From a great variety of circumstances—climatic, topographic, and alimental—the social, political, and religious institutions of the tribes of North American Indians differed in both kind and degree, and were not characterized by a like complexity of structure; but they did agree in the one fundamental principle that the organic units of the social fabric were based on kinship and its interrelations, and not on territorial districts or geographical areas.

In order to constitute a more or less permanent body politic or tribe, a people must be in more or less continuous and close contact, and possess a more or less common mental content—a definite sum of knowledge, beliefs, and sentiments—which largely supplies the motives for their rites and for the establishment and development of their institutions, and must also exhibit mental endowments and characteristics, that are likewise felt to be common, whose functioning results in unity of purpose, in patriotism, and in what is called common sense.

The tribe formed a political and territorial unit which, as has been indicated, was more or less permanently cohesive: its habitations were fixed, its dwellings were relatively permanent, its territorial boundaries were well established, and within this geographical district the people of the tribe represented by their chiefs and headmen assembled at stated times at a fixed place within their habitation and constituted a court of law and justice. At the time the North American Indians were first brought within the view of history, they were segregated into organized bodies of persons, and wherever they assembled they constituted a state, for they united the personal and the geographical ideas in fact, if not in theory.

Various terms have been employed by discoverers, travelers, and historians to designate this political and territorial unity. French writers employed "canton," "tribu," and "nation"; English writers used "tribe," "canton," and "kingdom"; while others have used "pagus," "shire," and "gau," the territorial meaning of which is that of a section or division of a country, whereas the concept to be expressed is that of a country, an entire territorial unit. Because the word "tribe" in its European denotation signifies a political unit only, its use without a definition is also inaccurate. The jejune and colorless terms "band" and "local group" are often employed as adequately descriptive of an organized body of Indian people; but neither of these expressions in the majority of cases should be used except when, from the lack of definite ethnologic information regarding the institutions of the people so designated, the employment of a more precise and descriptive term is precluded.

The effective power of the tribe for offense and defense was composed not only of the accumulated wealth of its members and the muscular strength, stamina, and experience of its quota of warriors, but also of the orenda (q. v.), or magic power, with which, it was assumed, its people, their weapons and implements, and their arts and institutions, were endowed.

Some tribes constituted independent states, while others through confederation with other tribes became organic units of a higher organization, retaining governmental control of purely local affairs only. Sometimes alliances between tribes were made to meet a passing emergency, but there was no attempt to coordinate structures of the social fabric in such manner as to secure permanency. Nevertheless in North America a number of complex, powerful, and well-planned confederations were established on universal principles of good government. Of this kind the League of the Five Tribes of the Iroquois in the closing decades of the 16th century was especially typical. This League was founded on the recognition and practice of six fundamentals: (1) the establishment and maintenance of public peace; (2) the security and health or welfare of the body; (3) the doing of justice or equity; (4) the advocacy and defense of the doing of justice; (5) the recognition of the authority of law, supported as it was by the body of warriors; and (6) the use and preservation of the orenda or magic power. The sum of the activities of these six principles in the public, foreign, and private life of these tribes so confederated resulted in the establishment and preservation of what in their tongue is called the Great Commonwealth.

In the history of the American Indian tribes, differences in culture are as frequent as coincidences. Different peoples have different ideas, different ideals, different methods of doing things, different modes of life, and of course different institutions in greatly different degrees and kinds. The course of the history of a people is not predetermined, and it is divergent from varying and variable conditions. Different results are consequent upon different departures. In some places tribal organizations are established on a clan or a gentile basis; in other regions a system of village communities was developed; and in still others pueblos or village communities were founded. From these different modes of life, influenced by varying environment and experiences, many new departures, resulting in unlike issues, were made. For the reason that the elementary group, the family, whence the other units are directly or mediately derived, is always preserved, coincidences are not infrequent. The term "family" here is taken in its broad sociologic sense, which is quite different from the modern use of it as equivalent to fireside (see Family). In gentile and clan tribal organizations a family consists of the union of two persons, each from a different gens or clan, as the case might be, and their offspring, who therefore have certain rights in, and owe certain obligations to, the two clans or gentes thus united in marriage by the two parents.

In historical times, in the group of Iroquois peoples, the tribes consisted of from 3 to 12 or 14 clans, irrespective of population. For social, political, and religious purposes the clans of a tribe were invariably organized into two tribal portions or organic units, commonly denominated phratries, each of which units in council, in games, in ceremonial assemblies, or in any tribal gathering occupied around the actual or assumed fire a place opposite to that held by the other phratry. In the placing of these clan groups the cult of the quarters is merely vestigial, having long ago lost its influence. In the great tribal gambling games between the units of the tribe (for phratry must at all times contend against phratry), the eastern side of the "plot" was regarded as insuring success; but at the present day the phratries alternate annually in occupying this auspicious quarter, although the phratry occupying this side is not at all times successful.

This dualism in the organization of the social, religious, and political units, next in importance to that of the tribe itself, is seemingly based on a concept derived from the primitive philosophy of the tribe regarding the procreation, reproduction, and maintenance of life on earth. The clans of a phratry, or association of clans, called one another "brothers," and the clans of the opposite phratry "cousins" or "offspring." In the elder period the phratry—the organic unit next to the tribe—was an incest group to the members of it, and consequently marriage was prohibited within it, hence the phratry was exogamous. But owing to the many displacements of the tribes by the advance of Caucasians this regulation in regard to the phratry has fallen into disuse, so that at the present time the clan alone is the exogamous group, just as the gens is the only exogamous group in those tribes in which gentile organizations prevail and gentile brotherhoods were formerly in vogue. There were, however, never any phratriarchs as such. The chiefs and other officers of the several clans acted as the directors and rulers of the two phratries, whose acts, to have tribal force and authority, must have had the approval of both phratries acting conjointly through their recognized representatives. Neither phratry could act for the tribe as a whole. The members of a phratry owed certain duties and obligations to the members of the opposite one; and these obligations were based not only on considerations of consanguinity and affinity but also on esoteric concepts as well. The reason for the last expression will be found to be cosmical and will be emphasized later.

Selecting the Iroquois tribes as fairly typical of those in which the clan organization had reached its highest development, it is found that in such a tribe citizenship consisted in being by birth or adoption (q. v.) a member of a clan, and membership by birth in a clan was traced only through the mother and her female ancestors; hence it was solely through the mother that the clan was preserved and kept distinct from every other. But although the child acquired his birth-rights only through his mother, singularly enough it was through the father that his or her kinship was extended beyond his own into that of his father's clan, which owed to the offspring of its sons certain important obligations, which bound these two clans together not only by marriage but by the stronger tie of a recognized kinship. By this process the clans of the tribe were bound together into a tribal unity. By the organization of the clans of the tribe into two exogamic groups, the possible number of clans between which the said mutual rights, privileges, and duties of fatherhood might subsist were in most cases reduced by about half; but this reduction was not the object of this dualism in tribal structure. The wise men of the early Iroquois, having endowed the bodies and elements of their environment and the fictions of their brains with human attributes, regarded these bodies and phenomena as anthropic beings, and so they imputed to them even social relations, such as kinship and affinity, and not the least of these imputed endowments was that of sex—the principles of fatherhood and motherhood. These beings were therefore apportioned in relative numbers to the two sexes. Even the Upper and the Lower and the Four Quarters were regarded as anthropic beings. They, too, were male and female; the Sky was male and a father; and the Earth was female and a mother; the Sun, their elder brother, was male, and the Moon, their grandmother, was female. And as this dual principle precedent to procreation was apparently everywhere present, it was deemed the part of wisdom, it would seem, to incorporate this dual principle by symbolism into the tribal structure, which was of course devised to secure not only welfare to its members living and those yet unborn, but also to effect the perpetuation of the tribe by fostering the begetting of offspring. If then a clan or a gens or a phratry of clans or gentes came to represent symbolically a single sex, it would consequently be regarded as unnatural or abnormal to permit marriage between members of such a symbolic group, and so prohibition of such marriage would naturally follow as a taboo, the breaking of which was sacrilegious. This would in time develop into the inhibition of marriage commonly called exogamy as a protest against unnatural and incestuous sex relations. The union of man and woman in marriage for the perpetuation of the race was but a combination in the concrete of the two great reproductive principles pervading all nature, the male and the female—the father and the mother. It would seem, then, that exogamy is not an inhibition arising from any influence of the clan or gentile tutelary, as some hold, but is rather the result of the expression or the typifying of the male and the female principles in nature—the dualism of the fatherhood and the motherhood of nature expressed in the social fabric.

In pursuing the study of this dualism in organic tribal structure it is important to note the appellations applied by the Iroquois to these two esoteric divisions.

When the Five Tribes, or the Five Nations as they were sometimes called, united in the formation of their famous League of the Iroquois, this dualistic concept was carefully incorporated into the structure of the organic federal law. The Mohawk, the Onondaga, and the Seneca were organized into a phratry of three tribes, ceremonially called the "Father's Brothers," while the Oneida and the Cayuga were organized into a phratry of two tribes, ceremonially called "My Offspring," or the phratry of the "Mother's Sisters." These esoteric designations are echoed and reëchoed in the long and interesting chants of the Condolence Council, whose functions are constructive and preservative of the unity of the League, and of course adversative to the destructive activity of death in its myriad forms.

It is equally important and interesting to note the fact that the name for "father" in the tongues of the Iroquois is the term which in the cognate Tuscarora dialect signifies 'male,' but not 'father,' without a characteristic dialectic change. It is thus shown that fundamentally the concepts "father" and "male" are identical.

In the autumn at the Green Corn Dance, and in the second month after the winter solstice at the extensive New Year ceremonies, the chiefs and the elders in each phratry receive from those of the other the enigmatic details of dreams dreamed by fasting children, to be interpreted by them in order to ascertain the personal tutelary (? totem, q. v.) of the dreamer. And in the earlier time, because the procreation of life and the preservation of it must originate with the paternal clan or association of clans, the members of such a clan should in a reasonable time replace a person killed or captured by enemies in the clan of their offspring. The paternal clan and the phratry to which it belonged was called, with reference to a third person, hoñdoñnis' 'hēn', i. e. 'his father's brothers (and kindred).' Since the clan, and therefore the tribe of which it is a component part, is supported by the numbers of those who compose it, whether men or women (for its power and wealth lie chiefly in the numbers of its constituents), it followed that the loss of a single person was a great one and one that it was necessary to restore by replacing the lacking person by one or many according to the esteem and the standing in which he was held. This peculiar duty and obligation of the members of the paternal clans to their offspring in the other clans is still typified among the modern Tuscarora and other Iroquois tribes on the first day of the new year. On this day it is customary to make calls of congratulation and for the purpose of receiving a present, usually some article of food, such as small cakes, doughnuts, apples, pieces of pie, etc. But every person on entering the house of a clansman of his or her father may demand, in addition to the ordinary presents provided, "a baby," using for this purpose the ordinary term for a baby, ow'rd'a'. To comply with these apprehended demands, the thrifty housewife, to aid her good man in fulfilling his obligations, usually has prepared in advance a goodly number of small mummy-like figures of pastry, 8 or 10 inches in length, to represent symbolically the "babies" demanded.

So it would seem that marriage, to be fruitful, must be contracted between members of the male and the female parts of the tribal unity. In primitive thought, kinship, expressed in terms of agnatic and enatic kinship, of consanguinity and affinity, was the one basis recognized in the structure of the social organization. At first all social relations and political and religious affiliations were founded on ties of blood kinship of varying degrees of closeness; but later, where such actual blood kinship was wanting, it was assumed by legal fictions (see Adoption). Within the family as well as outside of it the individual was governed by obligations based primarily on kinship of blood and on certain fundamental cosmical concepts consonant therewith.

The Omaha tribe is constituted of ten gentes organized into two divisions of five gentes each, and this dualism in the organization of the tribal gentes into two constituent exogamous bodies is apparently prevalent in all the tribes cognate with the Omaha, with perhaps the exception of the Ponca. When on the great annual tribal hunt, the Omaha tribe camped ceremonially in the form of an open or broken circle. When the tribe performed its religious rites this circle was always circumspectly oriented. But when the tribe was moving, the opening of the camp-circle always faced the direction in which the tribe was marching, although the opening was symbolically toward the E. This symbolic fiction was accomplished by turning the circle in such manner that if the actual opening faced the w. the five tribal gentes whose inviolable place was on the n. side of the circle when actually oriented would still be found on the n. side of the camp-circle and the other five gentes on the s. But it seems that this order was not always punctiliously observed at home. This persistent adjustment of the order in which the gentes were placed in regard to the real orient was a reflex of the cult of the quarters and apparently rested on a concept concerning the origin of life and of the bodies of the environing world. Like the Iroquois, and perhaps all the other Indian peoples of North America, the Omaha imputed life and human attributes and qualities to the various bodies and elements in nature. So regarding them as anthropomorphic beings, even social relations such as kinships and affinities were attributed to them, and not the least among these imputed properties was sex. Like all living things these bodies must need be apportioned to the two sexes. And as the various regions and quarters were regarded as beings, they also were male or female by nature. The Sky is male and a father, and the Earth is female and a mother; the Above is masculine, and the Below is feminine; the Sun is male, the Moon female. Since these two principles are necessary to the propagation of the races of men and animals, they were also made factors in the propagation and conservation of the necessities of life. And as this dualism appeared seemingly in all living things, it was deemed needful to embody these two so necessary principles symbolically in the organic units of the tribal organization; and so it would appear that the one side as the representative of the Sky was made male and the other as representing the Earth was made female. Therefore it would seem that marriage to be fruitful must be between the male and the female parts of the tribal unity. Descent being traced solely through the father, it was he who sustained the gens and kept it distinct from every other. By birth the child derived his name, his place, his taboo, and his share in the rites of his gens solely from his father; but, on the other hand, it was through his mother's gens that his kinship was projected beyond the gens of his birth. So it is clear that it is the tie of maternal kinship—the bond of affinity—that actually binds together the gentes and that impresses every individual with the cohesive sentiment that he is a member of an inter-related kinship body of persons.

According to Miss Fletcher (Nat. Mus. Rep., 1897), from whom the data characterizing the Omaha tribal organization has been largely derived, the distinctive features of the Omaha gens and those of its close cognates are, in general, that descent is traced only through the father, that the chieftainship is apparently not hereditary, that its members do not derive their lineage from a common ancestor, that it possesses a set of personal names, that it practises a common rite, that it is not named after any individual, and that it is exogamous. So that the Omaha tribe, having ten such gentes organized in two exogamous associations, to each of which belongs a tribal pipe and a phratriarch who is one of the governing council of seven chieftains, has, among other things, ten religious rites, ten taboos, ten sets of personal names, and a governing council of seven chieftains. Formerly marriage was permitted only between members of the two exogamous associations, but not between the members of either among themselves.

According to Boas there are remarkable differences in the complex social organizations of the tribes of the N. W. coast. Of these the Haida and the Tlingit, both having maternal descent, are each composed of two exogamous organic and organized halves or units, which among the Tlingit are called the Raven and the Wolf, respectively, while among the Haida they are known by the names Eagle and Raven. The sociology of these two tribes, while approximating in general structure that of the Tsimshian, having likewise a definite maternal organization, is less complex, for among the latter there are apparently four exogamous associations with subdivisions or subclans. Before any satisfactory knowledge of the tribal structure and its functions can be obtained, it is necessary to possess in addition to the foregoing general statements a detailed and systemized knowledge of the technique by which these several organic units, singly and jointly, transact the affairs of the tribe. This kind of information is still in large measure lacking for a great proportion of the North American Indian tribes. Among the Kwakiutl, Boas found a peculiar social organization which closer study may satisfactorily explain. Among the northern Kwakiutl tribes there are a number of exogamic clans in which descent is traced preferably in the maternal line, but in certain cases a child may be counted as a member of his father's clan. Yet, Boas adds, "By a peculiar arrangement, however, descent is so regulated that it proceeds in the maternal line."

In speaking of the widely prevalent dualism in the highest organic units of the tribal structure, especially with reference to these tribes of the N. W., Boas remarks: "Since the two-fold division of a whole tribe into exogamic groups is a phenomenon of very wide occurrence, it is fruitless to speculate on its origin in this special case, but it is worth while to point out that Dr Swanton in his investigations among the Haida was led to the conclusion that possibly the Eagle group may represent a foreign element in the tribe," and states what but few others appear to see: that the crest system ("totemism") on the Pacific coast is not necessarily connected with this peculiar division of the tribe. But it has already been herein indicated in what manner this dualism has been made a feature in the social structure of at least two linguistic stocks, and that the reasons there advanced may be tentatively accepted as at least a probable explanation of such divisions in other tribes having analogous social institutions, unless it can be shown with greater reason to be due to some other equally potent cause.

• Among the Salish, the clan and the gentile forms of social structure do not occur. In this respect the littoral Salish differ materially from those of the interior. Among the latter, according to Hill-Tout, the social fabric is so simple and loose that it "borders closely upon anarchy," while among the former it is comparatively complex, and the commune is divided into "a number of hard and fast classes or castes," three in number, exclusive of the slave class. Boas, writing in 1905 of the Salish tribes of the interior of British Columbia, says that in the "very loose" social organization of these people, if such it may be called, no tribal unit is recognized; that there are no exogamic groups; and no hereditary nobility was found, personal distinction being acquired chiefly by wealth and wisdom. While the exigencies of the food quest compelled these Indians to change their habitations from season to season, their permanent villages were situated in the river valleys. There are according to this author frequent and considerable fluctuations in the population of the villages, but it does not appear that these changes result in a diminution of the tribal population. It appears that deer-fences and fishing places were the property of certain persons and families, and moreover that the hunting territory was regarded as the common property of the whole tribe. From the prominence given to the "family" in marriage observances, in burial customs, and in property rights, it is possible that further investigation will reveal a much more complex and cohesive organization than is now known to exist.

According to Chamberlain the social structure of the Kutenai is remarkably simple, being in strong contrast to the social systems of great complexity found in British Columbia and on the N. W. coast. There is no evidence that the Kutenai have or ever had clan or gentile institutions or secret societies. Each tribal or local community had a chief whose office was hereditary, although the people always had the right to select some other member of the family when for any cause it was needful so to do. The power and authority of the chief was limited by the advice and action of the council. Formerly, a chief was elected to direct the great hunting expeditions. The population of the tribe was supported by the adoption of aliens by residence and by marriage. Descent was probably traced through the mother, and marriage of first cousins was strictly forbidden. These apparently tentative statements of Chamberlain indicate that the tribe was held together by the ties of consanguinity and affinity.

Tripas Blancas (Span.: 'white bellies'). A tribe living mainly in Coahuila, Mexico, and probably of Coahuiltecan stock, which in the 17th and 18th centuries was found at Nadadores, San Francisco Solano, and San Buenaventura missions, Coahuila. In 1688 they revolted and destroyed both the Nadadores and San Buenaventura missions (Portillo, Apuntes para la Hist. Antigua de Coahuila y Texas, 253, 1888; Valero Baptisms, 1705, 1707; Valero Burials, 1708, MS.). (H. E. B.)

Pajaritos.—Bandelier in Ritch, N. Mex., 201, 1885 (Span. 'birds'). Troomaxiaquino.—Oñate (1598) in Doc. Inéd., xvi, 116, 1871. Troomaxiaqui-no.—Bandelier, op. cit. Troomaxiaquino.—Bancroft, Ariz. and N. Mex., 136, 1889 (misprint).

Trophies. The North American Indians preserved and frequently wore as an adjunct of costume the tails, claws, paws, teeth, horns, feathers, pelts, and other parts of the animals that they killed. Somewhat less frequently scalps, skulls, fingers, hands, arms, skins, hearts, teeth, and other parts of the human body, nearly always taken from the enemies belonging to alien tribes, were preserved in a similar manner.

As for the signification of such trophies, whose use is not peculiar to any single people or time, the explanation is not simple. The purposes of trophies may be arranged in the order of their complexity as follows: (1) ornaments; (2) proofs of skill and prowess; (3) records of events in chase or war; (4) tokens of blood revenge; (5) fetishes, which may be the property of special persons, as sorcerers and medicine-men, or of societies, fraternities, or tribes. In no case does the trophy rise higher in the scale than fetishism.

Among the ancient Pueblo Indians trophies made of the jaws of animals were used. These were frequently sections cut from the jaw of the mountain lion and pierced for suspension, or the whole lower jaw of a deer decorated with bands of red paint. In one grave was found the skull of a dog, polished from long use.

Bear-claw necklaces were frequently worn as trophies by the Indians of the United States. The Cree of the Hudson bay region wore as a trophy the lip of the black bear, which was preserved, dressed, and ornamented with beads and strips of cloth. The Hopi of Arizona wore the paws of the porcupine. There were innumerable other kinds of trophies.

The western Eskimo introduced the trophy into art, engraving representations of skins, heads, or tails of animals killed in the chase on ivory drill-bows, bag handles, etc. Necklaces of human fingers and trophies of hands and limbs have been found among the Cheyenne, Apache, Navaho (?), Ute, Shoshoni, Chippewa, Sioux, some California tribes, the Virginia Indians, Mohawk, Caddo, Florida tribes, and others. A necklace composed of 8 left-hand middle fingers, 5 pouches made of human scrota, arrow-heads, glass and wampum beads, and fetishes cut from stone, captured by Gen. Crook in 1876 from the Cheyenne medicine-man Tall Wolf, are in the U. S. National Museum, as are also two necklaces consisting of the nails and first joints of human fingers, fastened to a beaded band of leather, from the Apache and the Ute. The medicine-men possessed a majority of the trophies preserved among the Indians and employed them for their supposed magic power. Some trophies, however, such as scalps, were tribal medicine. See Bourke in 9th Rep. B. A. E., 480-89, 1892; Hrdlička in Am. Anthr., x, 288, 1908; Friederici, (1) Skalpieren, 1906, (2) in Smithsonian Rep. 1906, 423, 1907. (W. H.)

Trotsikkutchin ('people of the fork of the river'). A Kutchin tribe on Yukon and Stewart rs., Yukon territory, extending up the latter stream to the mouth of Beaver r., where they meet the Esbataottine, to whom they are hostile. They are said to spear salmon in the shoals of the Yukon. Ross described their songs as more musical than those of any other northern Indians. Rampart Indians.—Ross, notes on Tinne, B. A. Tsaganha. An Iroquoian term, having here the phonetics of the Onondaga dialect, and freely rendered, 'One utters unintelligible speech,' and so approximately synonymous with 'alien,' 'foreigner.' Its literal meaning is 'one rolls (or purls) one's mouth (speech).' This term was applied to the several Algonquian tribes dwelling e. and s. of the Iroquois in widely separated localities; the Hurons applied the name to the "Canadiens" of 1626, i. e. the Algonquians dwelling on the Lower St. Lawrence. It was applied indiscriminately to the Abnaki, Mohegan, Mahican, Delawares, Munsee, Stockbridges, Brothertons, and generally to all the New England and contiguous southern Algonquian tribes. (J. N. B. H.)

Agotsaganens.—Jogues (1643) in Jes. Tsankawi ('place of the round cactus'). A prehistoric Tewa ruin on a lofty mesa between the Rito de los Frijoles on the s. and Los Alamos canyon on the n., about 5 m. w. of the Rio Grande, N. Mex. The ruins cover approximately 275 by 360 ft, and consist of the remains of four virtually independent blocks of community houses, built of dressed stones, surrounding a court with openings at the n. w. and s. e. corners. There are about 200 rooms in the ground-plan; when occupied the houses were probably of three stories at the highest points and accommodated 300 to 400 people. On the s. face of the mesa are numerous cliff houses of the character usually designated cavate lodges. See Hewett (1) in Am. Anthr., vi, 644, 1904, (2) in Bull. 32, B. A. E., 1906.

Sankawee.—Hewett, Syllabus of Lectures, 1900.

Tsattine ('dwellers among the beavers'). An Athapascan tribe, belonging to the Sekani group, who roam over the wide prairies s. of Peace r. and e. of the Rocky mts. Mackenzie spoke of them as one of the small tribes of Rocky Mountain Indians living in the Chipewyan country and speaking their language (Mass. Hist. Soc. Coll., 2d s., II, 42, 1814). On his map he locates them between Peace r. and Liard r., and says their name is derived from that of an affluent of the latter. It was, however, Peace r. that they called Tsades, 'the river of beavers' (Petitot, La Mer Glaciale, 292, 1887), and was the source of the supply of beaver furs early in the 19th century. Ross (MS., B. A. E.) said in 1858 that they resided in the country along Peace r.

from below Ft Vermilion to the Rocky mts., roaming as far as the upper Hay r. on one side and a little Slave lake on the other. Gibbs (MS., B. A. E.) located them w. of L. Athabasca, on Peace r. Hind (Labrador Penin., II, 261, 1863) said that they resorted to Fts Vermillion and Dunvegan. Petitot (Dict. Dènè Dindjié, xx, 1876) said that they hunted along Peace r. and that they formerly included the Sarsi. Dawson (Rep. Geol. Surv. Can., 1879-80, 51, 1881) gave their territory as along Peace r. n. to Battle r., e. to Simonelle r. to the fork of Smoky r., and w. to the portage of the Mountain of Rocks on Peace r., where they mingled with the Sekani. Morice (Trans. Can. Inst., 113, 1889) placed them in his Eastern Dénè division of the Athapascan, following the classification of Ross and Gibbs, and gave their habitat as along Peace r., trading at Hudson's Hope and Ft St John. In 1890 he stated that they inhabited both sides of Peace r. from Hudson's Hope to Ft Dunvegan. They are bolder and braver than their neighbors on the n. and superior in most ways to the Chipewyan, whom they much resemble in features, customs, and moral character. Their dialect is softer than that of the other Tinne tribes, it having been modified by their intercourse with the Cree. Possessing horses and subsisting principally on the products of the chase, they are more nomadic than the other mountain tribes. They are good workers in iron and make neat spurs and crooked knives out of worn-out files. In 1858 Ross found 35 of the tribe at Ft Resolution, on Great Slave lake. In 1889 Morice gave their supposed population for the entire tribe as 800, in 1906 as 700. Beaver.—Mackenzie, Voy., II, 81, 1802. Beaver Hunters.—Smet, Oregon Miss., 164, 1847. Beavers.—Morice in Anthropos, I, 272, 1906. Castors.—Petitot, Dict. A. E., 1890. Taa-ttiné.—Petitot, Dict. Dènè-Dindjié, xx, 1876. Taa-ttinè.—Petitot quoted by Hale in Rep. Brit. A. A. S. on N. W. Tribes, 21, 1888. Tzah-dinneh.—Balbi, Atlas Ethnog., 821, 1826.

Tsawarii (Tsa-wa'-ri-i). The Tewa name of a pueblo that once stood at or near the present hamlet of La Puebla, or Pueblito, a few miles above the town of Santa Cruz, in s. e. Rio Arriba co., N. Mex. According to Tewa informants it was once occupied by some of their people who went to live with the Hopi (see Hano). The place seems to be identical with the Tcewadi or Tcewadigi of Hano Tewa tradition as recorded by Fewkes and Stephen. It would seem that the inhabitants of San Cristóbal (q. v.) occupied Tsawarii, or the site after its abandonment, on removing from their own home. (v. w. h.)

Uhuwari.—Hodge, field notes, B. A. E., 1895 (Name information). Tsawwadi.—Stephen in 15th Rep. B. A. E., 35, 1891. Tsawwadi.—Ibid. Tsawwadi.—Fewkes in 19th Rep. B. A. E., 314, 1900. Tsawwadi.—Hodge, op. cit. (Santa Clara information).

Tsawatenok (Ts'd'watséndz, or Dai'wadañm, 'people of the eulachon country'). A Kwakiutl tribe on Kingcombe inlet, Brit. Col. Their gentes (according to Boas) are Lelewagyila, Gyigyekemae, Wiwokemae, Gyagygyilakya, and Kaka-watilikya. In winter they occupy the town of Kwaustunis conjointly with the Hahumais and Guamenok; in summer they go to Hata and Kwae. Pop. in 1910 (probably including the Guamenok), 226, all of whom are members of the Anglican church.

Tsayiskithai.—Matthews in Jour. Am. Folk-lore, III, 108, 1900. Tsayiskithai.—Matthews, Navaho Legends, 30, 1897.

Tschantoga ('people of the woods', from chan, 'tree'). A division of the Assiniboin, which Dobbs (Hudson's Bay, 35, map, 1744) placed a considerable distance n. w. of L. Winnipeg, Canada. Smet (Oregon Miss., 150, 1847) said that they did not number more than 50 lodges, divided into several bands, and were seldom seen on the plains, but "travel over the mountains and through the woods, over the different forks and branches of the sources of the Saskatchewan and Athabaska." Jefferys in 1741 placed them n. w. of L. Winnipeg, and in 1776 in lat. 55°. Their usual habitat at that time was not far from Saskatchewan r. They are probably the same as the Strongwood Assiniboin, who in 1808 were on Battle r. and between it and the s. branch of the Saskatchewan, according to Henry (Cous, Henry-Thompson Jour., II, 522, 1897). They ranged as far s. as Little Missouri r., if identical with the Oseegah of Lewis and Clark (Discov., 43, 1806) and the Waziah that Hayden found in United States territory, though they traded at the Hudson's Bay Co.'s posts on Assiniboin r. Denig said that the Waziah whom he met in Dakota, 60 lodges under chief Le Robe de Vent, came from the n. in 1839. According to Hayden they numbered 120 to 200 persons in 1862. Lewis (Statist. View, 1817) said there were between Little Missouri and Assiniboin rs. 100 lodges, 250 warriors, and a total population of 880. Under the official designation "Stonies" they now occupy a reserve of 69,720 acres, divided by Bow r., in the foothills of the Rocky mts., about 40 m. w. of Calgary, Alberta. They are described as of pleasant visage, active and fleet of foot, and the most energetic of all the tribes of the Canadian N. W. They gain a livelihood by stockraising, by selling timber, furs, and beadwork, and by laboring for ranchmen. A mission was established among them in 1873, and in 1904 the McDougall boarding school at Morley accommodated 48 children. Pop. 667 in 1910. Cf. Chabin, or Gens des Montagnes, of Maximilian.

Tsihlinainde ('mountain-standing-across people'). A division of the Mescalero Apache who claim as their former home the region of the San Andrés mts., N. Mex., hence their name. (J. M.)

Ohilpaines.—Orozco y Berra, Geog., 59, 1864 (probably identical). Tsi'l-Iná-inde.—Mooney, field notes, B. A. E., 1897.

Tsilacomap. A former village, probably Salinan, connected with San Antonio mission, Monterey co., Cal.—Taylor in Cal. Farmer, Apr. 27, 1860.

Tsilaluhi (Tsilalú'hi, 'sweet-gum place'). A former Cherokee settlement on a small branch of Brasstown cr. of Hiwassee r., just within the line of Towns co., Ga.—Mooney in 19th Rep. B. A. E., 537, 1900.

Tsilkotin ('people of young-man's river'). An Athapascan tribe of British Columbia, occupying a territory lying chiefly in the valley of Chilcotin r. at about lat. 52°. Their nearest relatives are the Takulli, or Carriers, whose territory is adjacent on the n., and who are the only Athapascan people with whom they come in contact. Toward the w. a pass leads through the Coast range to Bellacoola, and intercourse with the tribe of that name, which was formerly frequent (see Nakuntlun), is still kept up to some extent. In early days there was also some communication with the Kwakiutl of Knights inlet on the s. w. On the e. the Tsilkotin are separated from the Shuswap by Fraser r., and do not hold very intimate relations with that people. In earlier times the two tribes were constantly at war, the Tsilkotin invading their country and penetrating as far as Similkameen valley, whose inhabitants are descended from the invaders, who compelled the Salish to make peace and permit intermarriage. Even to-day there is a decided undercurrent of suspicion between the Tsilkotin and the Shuswap. Toward the s. their nearest neighbors are the Lillooet, but contact between the two tribes is slight.

In former times, and down to within about 40 years, the center of territory and population of the Tsilkotin was Anahem lake; and from here they covered a considerable extent of country, the principal points of gathering being Tatlah, Puntze, and Chizilikut lakes. They ranged as far s. as Chilco lake, and at the time of salmon fishing were accustomed to move in large numbers down to Chilcotin r., to a point near the present Anahem res., always returning to their homes as soon as the season was past. More recently they have been brought to the eastward, and to-day the chief centers of the tribe are three reservations in the valley of the Chilcotin—Anahem, Stone, Risky Creek—and the Carrier res. at Alexandria, on Fraser r., where a few Tsilkotin families reside (see Stella). Besides these there are a number of families leading a seminomadic life in the old tribal territory, in the woods and mountains to the westward. These latter Indians, considerably less influenced by civilization than their reservation relatives, are known by the whites as "Stone Chilcotin," or "Stonies." Although subjected to intercourse with the whites for a comparatively short period, the Tsilkotin have assimilated the customs and ideas of their civilized neighbors to such an extent that their own have largely disappeared, except among the families still living in the mountains. The sedentary Tsilkotin, who have abandoned semisubterranean huts and live like their white neighbors in log houses covered with mud, now cultivate cereals, peas, and potatoes, and are reported to be moral, temperate, and religious. These Morice divides into the Tleskotin, Tlathenkotin, and Toosey. Their population was estimated at 450 in 1906. For their mythology, see Farrand in Mem. Am. Mus. Nat. Hist., Anthr. III, no. 1, 1900. (L. F.)

Chilootin.—Cox, Columbia R., II, 368, 1831. Chilootin.—Taylor in Cal. Farmer, July 19, 1862. Chilixotin.—Morice in Proc. Can. 'live outside in the mountains'). Zill-tar-dins.—White, Hist. Apaches, MS., B. A. E., 1875 (=Coyoteros).

Tsimshian ('people of Skeena r.'). The most important of the three main divisions of the Chimmesyan linguistic family, and that which gives it its name. In the strictest sense it designates the following closely related tribes or divisions living between Nass and Skeena rs., N. Brit. Col.: Kilutsai, Kinagingee, Kinuhtoiā, Kishpachlaots, Kitlani, Kitsalthal, Kitunto, Kitwilgioks, Kitwilksheba, and Kitzeesh. To these are sometimes added the Kitzilas and Kitzimgaylum, who live farther up Skeena r., near the canyon, but speak the same dialect. The appellation has also been extended to cover all other tribes speaking this dialect, viz, the Kitkahta, Kitkatla, and Kittizoo, who live on the islands southward. The divisional names given are also names of the ancient towns. To these may be added the following modern towns: New Kitzilas, Metlakatla (New and Old), Port Essington, and Port Simpson. Pop. in 1908 (including 465 enumerated in Duncan's colony, Alaska, in 1900), 1,340.

The name for this division has been so often extended to include other branches of it that some of the synonyms may have a similar extension. (J. R. S.)

Tsinthobetlo (Tsinçðbello, 'tree sweeping the water,' referring probably to a birch). Mentioned in the Navaho genesis myth as one of the stopping places of that tribe on the Rio San Juan, N. W. N. Mex., where the then existing clans were joined by the Tsinazhini clan.—Matthews in Jour. Am. Folk-lore, III, 92, 1890.

Tsiomhau (Ts'iomxau). A Wikenno village on Rivers inlet, Brit. Col.—Boas in Petermanns Mitteil., pt. 5, 130, 1887.

Tsiplakwe (Zuñi: 'straight-down-hair people.'—Cushing). An unidentified tribe whose habitat, according to Cushing, is said by the Zuñi to have been on the headwaters of Salt r. in E. Arizona or W. New Mexico, while the Hopi asserted to Fewkes that they lived midway between Zuñi and the Hopi country of N. E. Arizona. They are known to history solely through the attempt of Fray Martin de Arvide, in Feb. 1632, to visit them from Zuñi in company with 2 soldiers, 5 Zuñi, and a mestizo. The missionary and the soldiers were murdered by their companions five days out from Zuñi. According also to Cushing the Zuñi say that the tribe was exterminated by the

and tockaawgh. The Virginian tockahonghe, as the cognate Delaware p'tuck-quen and the Cree pittikwow indicate, signifies 'it is globular,' and was a general term applied to bulbous roots used by the Indians of this region for food purposes. According to Bartlett (Dict. Americanisms, 722, 1877), "the term tuckahoe is often applied to an inhabitant of Lower Virginia, and to the poor land in that portion of the state." In some parts of the South tuckahoe means 'poor white.' (A. F. C.)

Tuckaseegee (Tsiksi'tsi, or, in dialectic form, Túksi'tsi, of unknown meaning). The name of two former Cherokee settlements: (1) about the junction of the two forks of Tuckasegee r., above Webster, Jackson co., N. C. (not to be confounded with Tikwalitsi, q. v.); (2) on a branch of Brasstown cr. of Hiwassee r., in Towns co., Ga. (J. M.)

Táksi'tsi.—Mooney in 19th Rep. B. A. E., 537, 1900 (correct Cherokee form). Tuckasegee.—Doc. of 1755 quoted by Royce in 5th Rep. B. A. E., 143, 1887. Táksi'tsi.—Mooney, op. cit. (dialectic form).

Tuckernuck. A word used in some parts of s. e. Massachusetts in the sense of picnic: from the name of an island off Nantucket, probably from petukwínak, 'round island' (Gerard). The name seems to have been given the island in reference to its shape.

Tucsani. A rancharia, probably of the Maricopa, on the Rio Gila, Ariz., visited by Kino and Mange in 1699. Not to be confounded with Tucson or Tusonimo. See Upasoitac.

S. Limon Tucsani.—Kino (1699) as quoted by Bancroft, No. Mex. States, I, 268, 1884. S. Simeon de Tucsani.—Kino, map (1702) in Stöcklein, Neue Welt-Bott, 74, 1726. S. Tucsasic. A former Maricopa rancharia, on Gila r., s. Ariz.—Rudo Ensayo (ca. 1763), 22, 1863.

Tucson (Papago: Tu-uk-so-on', 'black base,' in allusion to a dark volcanic stratum in an adjacent mountain). A former rancharia, probably of mixed Papago, Sobaipuri, and Pima, on the site of the present city of the same name in Arizona. Much misunderstanding has arisen respecting the establishment of the settlement, which, as an Indian town, was doubtless prehistoric. It was first mentioned by the Jesuit Father Kino, in 1699, under the name San Agustin, a name transferred to the Spanish presidio (Presidio de San Agustin del Tuquison) established there in 1776 on its removal from Tubac; and, to distinguish the near-by Indian village, the latter was called San Agustin del Pueblito de Tucson. The native population in 1760-67 was 331, and 200 families were settled there in 1772; but two years later, when visited by Anza, it contained only 80 families of so-called

"Pimas." Tucson remained a military outpost of Mexico until 1853, when it was taken possession of by the United States as a part of the Gadsden purchase. In 1848 its population was 760, increased in December of that year by refugees from Tubac and Tumacacori on account of Apache troubles. Tucson was the capital of Arizona from 1867 to 1877. See Bancroft, Ariz. and N. Mex., 1889; Bartlett, Pers. Narr., II, 1854; Coues, Garcés Diary, 1900; McGee in Coville and Macdougall, Des. Bot. Lab., 1903. (F. W. H.)

Fucson.—Cooke in Emory, Recon., 554, 1848 (misprint). Fucson.—ten Kate in Bull. Soc. d'Anthr. de Paris, 874, 1883 (misprint). Lucson.—Johnston in Emory, Recon., 591, 1848 (misprint). S. Agustin de Tuson.—Yuma Sentinel, Apr. 13, 1878, quoted by Bancroft, ibid. (presidio name in 1777). San José de Tucson.—Reyes (1772), ibid., 381 (the rancharia). Sa-sils-go-lon-a.—White, Apache Names of Indian Tribes, MS., B. A. E. ('many chimneys': Apache name). Stjoekson.—ten Kate, Reizen in N. A., 159, 1885 (native name). Styucson.—Bandelier in Rev. d'Ethnog., 203, 1886 (native name). Teusón.—Hughes, Doniphan's Exped., 247, 1848. Toison.—Hardy, Travels, 421, 1829 (trans.: 'golden fleece'). Tubao.—Folsom, Mexico, map, 1842. Tubson.—Pike, Exped., 3d map, 1810. Tucsson.—Rudo Ensayo (ca. 1763), 103, 1863. Tucson.—Pope, Explor., map, 1854. Tucson.—Cooke in Emory, Recon., 555, 1848. Tugson.—Anza (1775) quoted by Bancroft, Ariz. and N. Mex., 382, 1889. Tuguison.—Ibid. Tuison.—Anza (1780) quoted, ibid., 392. Tucson.—Marcy, Prairie Trav., map, 1861. Tuquison.—Anza (1780) quoted by Bancroft, Ariz. and N. Mex., 392, 1889. Tuqulson.—Font, map (1777), ibid., 393. Tuuksoon.—McGee in Coville and Macdougall, Des. Bot. Lab., 15, 1903 (aboriginal name).

Tucubavia. A former Pima rancharia on the headwaters of Rio Altar, N. Sonora, Mexico, visited by Father Kino in 1694 and 1700. It afterward formed one of the visitas of the mission of Guevavi. Tacubavia.—Bancroft, No. Mex. States, I, 258, 1884. Tucubavi.—Rudo Ensayo (ca. 1763), 193, 1863. Tucubavia.—Kino (1694) in Doc. Hist. Mex., 4th s., I, 252, 1856. Tucuvavi.—Rudo Ensayo, op. cit., 161.

Tucremu.—Taylor in Cal. Farmer, Apr. 17, 1863. Tucumu.—Cabrillo (1542) in Smith, Colec. Doc. Fla., 181, 1857. Túh'-mu.—Henshaw, Buenaventura MS. vocab., B. A. E., 1884.

Tucururu. A former Timucuan dialect, and probable subtribe, on the Atlantic coast of Florida or Georgia, apparently on Cumberland id., within the territory claimed by Saturiba (q. v.).—Gatschet (quoting Pareja, ca. 1612), Timucua Lang., in Proc. Am. Philos. Soc., xviii, 479, 1880.

Tudisishn ('black water'). An Apache band or clan at San Carlos agency and Ft Apache, Ariz., in 1881.—Bourke in Jour. Am. Folk-lore, III, 111, 1890.

Tueadasso (Tiio'eäda''so, 'tails [of rushes or other plants] floating there.'—Hewitt). A former Onondaga village near the present Jamesville, Onondaga co., N. Y.

Cachiadachse.—Weiser (1743) in Min. Prov. Council Pa., IV, 660, 1851. Cajadachse.—Weiser quoted by Beauchamp in Bull. N. Y. State Mus. no. 108, 154, 1907. Tiahton.—Beauchamp, ibid. Tiatáhtont.—Spangenberg (1745) in Pa. Mag., III, 61, 1879. Tiojachso.—Beauchamp, op cit. Tu-e-a-das'-so.—Morgan, League Iroquois, II, 87, 1904.

Tuerto. A former pueblo of the Tano, near the present Golden City, Santa Fé co., N. Mex., which, according to Bandelier (Arch. Inst. Papers, IV, 124, 1892), was probably abandoned in 1591 on account of a raid by other Indians. Zárate-Salmerón, about 1629 (Bancroft, Native Races, I, 600, 1882), states that it was one of the two pueblos of the Pecos tribe. Possibly identical with the Puerto (q. v.) of Oñate.

El Tuerto.—Bandelier in Arch. Inst. Papers, IV, 108, 1892. Kaspô.—Bandelier, Gilded Man, 221, 1893. Ka-po.—Bandelier in Arch. Inst. Papers, IV, 108, 1892 (Tano name). Tuerto.—Bandelier in Ritch, N. Mex., 201, 1885.

Tuesapit. A Maricopa rancheria on the Rio Gila, Ariz., in 1744.—Sedelmair (1744) cited by Bancroft, Ariz. and N. Mex., 366, 1889.

Tuetinini ('no-water people'). A division of the Mescalero Apache who claim the region about Marathon, Texas, as their former home.

Tugaloo (Dugilu'yí, abbreviated as Dugilu', and seeming to refer to a place at the forks of a stream). A former Cherokee settlement on the river of the same name, at the junction of Toccoa cr., in Habersham co., Ga. The name is sometimes written Toogelah and Toogoola. (J. M.)

Dugilu'yí.—Mooney in 19th Rep. B. A. E., 516, 1900 (proper Cherokee name). Toogelah.—Mooney, ibid. (a form sometimes used). Toogoola.—Ibid. (a form sometimes used). Tugilo.—Bartram, Travels, 372, 1792.

Tugulan. (Given by Humboldt (New Spain, II, 344, 1822) as a Yuit Eskimo village in N. E. Siberia, but more likely a Chukchi settlement.

Tuhaushuwithe (Tu'-hau-cu-wi'-t'çe). A Yaquina village on the s. side of Yaquina r., Oreg.—Dorsey in Jour. Am. Folk-lore, III, 229, 1890.

Tuhezep (Tûxezé'p, shortened form of xûzé'êp, 'sharp ground or place for pitching lodges,' so called from small sharp stones around there.—Teit). A Ntlakya-pamuk village on the E. side of Fraser r., about a mile above Lytton, Brit. Col.

Tayosap.—Can. Ind. Aff., 79, 1878. Tûxezé'p.—Teit in Mem. Am. Mus. Nat. Hist., II, 172, 1900.

Tuhkpahhukstaht (Tuhk-pah-huks-taht, 'pumpkin-vine village'). A band of the Skidi Pawnee, so named, it is said, from the fact that once, after planting time, this band went off on the summer hunt, and while they were away the pumpkin vines grew so luxuriantly that they climbed over their lodges, covering and hiding them.—Grinnell, Pawnee Hero Stories, 237, 1889.

Tuhukmache. A Yokuts (Mariposan) tribe that probably resided on Kings r., but perhaps on the Kaweah. They were one of a group of tribes of central California that joined in ceding their lands to the United States by treaty of May 13, 1851. (A. L. K.)

To-ke-ma-che.—Wessells (1853) in H. R. Ex. Doc. 76, 34th Cong., 3d sess., 31, 1857. Tu-huo-mach.—Royce in 18th Rep. B. A. E., 782, 1899. Tu-hue-ma-chea.—Barbour in Sen. Ex. Doc. 4, 32d Cong., spec. sess., 254, 1853. Tu-huk-naha.—Johnston in Sen. Ex. Doc. 61, 32d Cong., 1st sess., 22, 1852.

Tui (Tu'i). The Yurok name of a Karok village on the w. side of Klamath r., N. W. Cal., between Orleans Bar and Redcap cr. (A. L. K.)

Tuiban. A tribe mentioned by Langsdorff (Voy., II, 163, 1814) as inhabiting the coast of California. It seemingly belonged to the Costanoan family.

Tuim. The Wolf clan of the Tigua Pueblo of Isleta, N. Mex.

Tûim-t'ainin.—Lummis quoted by Hodge in Am. Anthr., IX, 352, 1896 (t'ainin = 'people').

Tuiskistiks (Tûis-kîs'-fîks, 'mosquitos'). A society of the Ikunuhkahtsi, or All Comrades, in the Piegan tribe of the Siksika. It is composed of men who were constantly going to war.—Grinnell, Blackfoot Lodge Tales, 221, 1892.

Tuinnuk ('marsh people'). The Kaniagmiut Eskimo name for a division of the Knaiakhotana of Cook inlet, Alaska.—Hoffman, Kadiak MS., B. A. E., 1882.

Tujanisnissilac. A Chumashan village formerly near Santa Inés mission, Santa Barbara co., Cal.—Taylor in Cal. Farmer, Oct. 18, 1861.

Tukabatchi. A former Upper Creek town on the w. bank of Tallapoosa r., opposite Talasse, in Elmore co., Ala. A trader's trail crossed the river at this point. In later times the place became a tribal center, though it suffered much in the wars with the Chickasaw. It was here that Tecumseh (q. v.) met the Upper Creeks when he tried to incite them to war against the United States. The people of the town had several traditions in regard to their origin, one of which claimed that they came from the N. It is probable they were in part Shawnee. They had in possession certain metal plates which they had preserved from time immemorial. Adair (Hist. Ind., 178, 1775) says that in his time they consisted of 5 copper and 2 brass plates which were produced only at the busk (q. v.). In 1799 the place could muster 116 warriors, and in 1832 it contained 386 houses. See Gatschet, Creek Migr. Leg., I, 147-8, 1884.

Tukinobi. A former pueblo of the Hopi, traces of the ruins of which are discernible on a large hill on the summit of East Mesa, Tusayan, N. E. Arizona.—Fewkes in 17th Rep. B. A. E., 589, 1898.

Tukkuthkutchin ('squint-eyed people'). A Kutchin tribe at the head of Porcupine r., occupying the territory between the headwaters of the Porcupine r. and Ft McPherson, in the northern Yukon Ter., Canada. Their eyes are frequently small and oblique, hence their name. Although barbarous they are more intelligent than other tribes. They are a commercial people, living by barter.

Though good hunters, rarely lacking food, they do not hunt furs, but exchange their beads, which form the circulating medium, for the peltry of the neighboring tribes. They are fond of oratorical display, and in their harangues the voice of the speaker gradually rises, becoming a screech at the climax. They subsist at all seasons almost exclusively on caribou, which they hunt on the mountains. Formerly they were numerous, but by 1866 they had become reduced to 15 hunters or 40 men. Dawson (Rep. Geol. Surv. Can. 1888, 206B, 1889) gave the number of inhabitants of Peel r. and La Pierres House, the Tatlitkutchin and Tukkuthkutchin together, as 337, consisting of 185 males and 152 females. Morice estimated their number at 150 in 1906.

Tulareños (Span.: 'those of the tulares,' or tracts of land containing tules or reeds). A term applied loosely to the tribes of the great valley of San Joaquin r. and Tulare lake, and even of lower Sacramento valley, Cal. As this territory included Moquelumnan, Yokuts (Mariposan), and Shoshonean tribes, the word is without ethnic significance. Until July 20, 1903, there was a "Mission-Tule River Consolidated Agency" in California, when, by order of the Secretary of the Interior, it was subdivided, part becoming the Mission res. (with 2,897 Indians in 1908), the other the Tule River res. (with 151 Indians).

Tulibee. A species of whitefish (Coregonus tullibee) of the Great Lakes and the waters of the Canadian N. W., the mongrel whitefish. The Canadian-French form of the word, which came into English as tulibee, or tullibee, from n. w. Canada, is toulibi, representing the otonabi of the Cree-Chippewa dialects of Algonquian, with the well-known interchange of n and l and the dropping of the first syllable. The word signifies literally 'mouth water,' from oton, 'its mouth,' and abi,

'water,' 'liquid,' referring to the watery flesh of this fish. (A. F. C.)

Tulik (Aleut: 'fissure'). An Aleut village formerly on Umnak, Aleutian ids., Alaska, situated near a volcano of the same name. Pop. 26 in 1834.

Tulkepaia (Yuman: Tulkepaia venuna tche'hwale, probably meaning 'spotted-belly sparrows.'—Corbusier). A body of Yuman Indians, popularly known as Apache Yumas, said by Corbusier (1886) to have recently sprung from a mixture of Yuma, Mohave, and Yavapai. They claimed as their home the desert stretch of w. Arizona between the Colorado r. and the country of the Yavapai, over which they roamed until placed on the Rio Verde res., Ariz., in May, 1873. In 1875 most of these, numbering in all about 500, were removed to the San Carlos res., where they numbered 352 in the following year. They speak the Yavapai dialect with a few lexical differences. See Tontos. (A. S. G.)

Tuluka. A former Patwin village in Pope valley, Napa co., Cal. According to Powers the Spaniards carried away most of the tribe in 1838 to Sonoma mission, where the larger portion soon died from smallpox. There were only 3 survivors in 1842.

Re'-ho.—Powers in Cont. N. A. Ethnol., III, 238, 1877 (named from a chief). Tulkaya.—Taylor in Cal. Farmer, Mar. 30, 1860. Tu-lo-kai'-di-sel.—Powers, op. cit. Tuluka.—S. A. Barrett, inf'n, 1905.

Tuluka. A Kuskwogmiut Eskimo village on the right bank of Kuskokwim r., Alaska; pop. 59 in 1880, 17 in 1890.

Toolooka-anacamute.—Petroff in 10th Census, Alaska, 16, 1884. Tooluka-anahamute.—Ibid., map.

Tulukagnagamiut.—11th Census, Alaska, 164, 1893.
Tuluksak. A Kuskwogmiut Eskimo village on the left bank of Kuskokwim r., Alaska, 40 m. above Bethel; pop. 150 in 1880, 62 in 1890.

Tulukiak.—Hallock in Nat. Geog. Mag., ix, 90, 1898 (misprint). Toulakságamut.—Spurr (1898) quoted by Baker, Geog. Dict. Alaska, 1902. Tulukagmiut.—11th Census, Alaska, 164, 1893.

Tulwutmetunne ('people in the open prairie'). A band of the Mishikhwutmetunne formerly residing on Coquille r., Oreg.

Túl-wút'-me.—Dorsey in Jour. Am. Folk-lore, III, 232, 1890. Túl'-wút-me'júnñé'.—Ibid.

Tumac. Said to be the westernmost settlement of the Maricopa on Gila r., s. w. Ariz., in the 18th century.—Orozco y Berra, Geog., 348, 1864.

Tumacacori (from Pima Tsü-ma-ka'-kork, 'curved peak.'—ten Kate). A former rancheria of one of the Piman tribes, probably Sobaipuri, on Rio Santa Cruz, s. of Tubac and 8 leagues n. n. w. of Guevavi, s. Arizona. It was visited by Father Kino in 1697-1701, and afterward became a visita of Guevavi, with 199 natives in 1764-67, and 39 in 1772, at which date it was almost in ruins from Apache depredations in 1769. In 1784 or earlier it had become the mission of San José, and was occupied as such until 1820, when the church, erected by the Jesuits in 1752, was destroyed by the Apache. The ruins are still visible.

Tumalenia (Tu-ma-leh-ma). A tribe, probably Moquelumnan, formerly living at Bodega bay, Cal., and speaking a language different from the Gallinero, the next tribe to the n.—Gibbs in Schoolcraft, Ind. Tribes, 111, 102, 1853.

Tumamar. A tribe or subtribe, evidently Coahuiltecan, encountered n. of the Rio Grande as early as 1675, when Fernando del Bosque crossed into Texas (Nat. Geog. Mag., xiv, 340-45, 1903). Early in the 18th century they became well known at San Francisco Solano mission on the Rio Grande in Mexico, and after this mission became San Antonio de Valero, on the Rio San Antonio in Texas, some members of the tribe followed it (Baptismal Rec. of San Antonio de Valero, MS.). At the first mission named they mingled freely with the Terocollame, a Tumamar being at one time chief of the latter band. The tribe ranged far to the e., sometimes being met on the Brazos (Espínosa, Diario, entry for June 10, 1716, MS.). The tribal name, which was most commonly written Tumamar and Ticumamar, seems to have disappeared before the middle of the 18th century. (H. E. S.)

Tumamara.—Fernando del Bosque (1675), op. cit. Tumamara.—Ortiz y Berro, Geog., 306, 1894. Tumamara.—Espínosa (1716), op. cit. Tumamar.—Fernando del Bosque (1675), op. cit. (given as chief's name).

Tumidek. According to Powers, a division of the Miwok formerly living in the region of Mokelumne r., in Calaveras and Amador cos., Cal. In reality the name has the same significance as Tumuleko, q. v. Tumidek.—Powers in Overland Mo., x, 324, 1872. Tu'mi-dek.—Powers in Cont. N. A. Ethnol., 111, 349, 1877.

Tumkoakayas (Tumko'akya). A Bella-coola gens at Talio, Brit. Col.—Boas in 7th Rep. N. W. Tribes Can., 3, 1891.

Tummeli (Tum'-meli). A Maidu division living along the n. fork of American r., from a little above Coloma to River-ton, Eldorado co., Cal. (H. E. S.)

Tumna (properly Dumna). A former Yokuts (Mariposan) tribe that lived on upper San Joaquin r. and n. to Kings r., Cal. They were one of the tribes that coded their lands to the United States by treaty of Apr. 29, 1851, and were then placed on a reserve between Chowchilla and Kaweah rs. (A. L. K.)

Dumna.—Kroeber in Univ. Cal. Pub., Am. Arch. and Eth., 11, 311, 1907 (proper name). Leumna.—Henley in Ind. Aff. Rep., 512, 1854. Team-na.—Ind. Aff. Rep., 223, 1851; Royce in 18th Rep. B. A. E., 782, 1899. Team-na.—Ind. Aff. Rep., 223, 1851.

Tump. According to Bartlett (Dict. of Americanisms, 723, 1877), "to tump" signifies "to draw a deer or other animal home through the woods after he has been killed"; a word in use in the hunting regions of Maine, from the Abnaki dialect of Algonquian. (A. F. C.)

Tumpatague. One of 36 tribes reported in 1683 to Domingo de Mendoza (Viaje, MS. in Archivo Gen. de Méx.) as being friendly to the Jumano (Tawehash) and living three days' journey eastward from the junction of the Rio Grande and the Conchos. This would place them in s. w. Texas. (H. E. S.)

Tump-line. A pack strap or portage strap. Bartlett (Dict. of Americanisms, 723, 1877) says: "A strap placed across the forehead to assist a man in carrying a pack on his back. Used in Maine, where the custom was borrowed from the Indians." The first part of this word is derived, according to De Cost Smith, from madámbo, which in the Abnaki dialect of Algonquian signifies 'pack strap,' 'burden strap'; line is English. According to Prince (Am. Anthr., 12, no. 3, 1907) the modern Abnaki form is madomba, and the present-day Mashpee td'mpim. (A. F. C.)

TUMP-LINE IN USE

Tumpi. A tribe or subtribe, of unknown affinity, represented in 1728 at San Antonio de Valero mission, Texas (Valero Burials, 1728, partida 154, MS.).

Tamtla ('paint'). A Squawmish village on the e. side of Howe rd., Brit. Col.—Hill-Tout in Rep. Brit. A. A. S., 474, 1900.

Tumna. A name said by Powers (Cont. N. A. Ethnol., 111, 349, 1877) to be applied by the Miwok n. of Stanislaus r., Stanislaus co., Cal., to their northern congeners. Powers derives the name from tu'mna, 'north.' It is, however, very probably another rendition of chumetoko, a term derived from the Miwok chumek, 'south,' and itself signifying 'southerners.' Cf. Tumuleko. (H. E. S.)

Tunagak. An Eskimo village in the Kuskokwim district, Alaska; pop. 71 in 1890.

Tunaghamet.—11th Census, Alaska, 164, 1892.

Tanal. A former pueblo of the Tepehuane, in Durango, Mexico; definite locality unknown.

al Tanal.—Ortiz y Berro, Geog., 312, 1894.

Tunapin (Tu'-non-p'in, 'black bear').

Too-num'-pe.—Morgan, Anc. Soc., 156, 1877. Tu'-naa'-p'ia.—Dorsey in 15th Rep. B. A. E., 238, 1897.

Tunanpin. A gens of the Missouri (q. v.).

Moon'-cha.—Morgan, Anc. Soc., 156, 1877. Tu-naa'-p'ia.—Dorsey in 15th Rep. B. A. E., 240, 1897.

Tunanpin. A gens of the Oto (q. v.). Me-je'-rä-ja.—Morgan, Anc. Soc., 156, 1877 (= 'Wolf'; given as distinct from Bear gens). Moon'-cha.—Ibid. ('Bear'). Mūn'-toi'-ra-toe.—Dorsey in 15th Rep. B. A. E., 240, 1897 ('Wolf'). Tu-naa'-p'ia.—Ibid. ('Black bear').

Tundastusa (Apache: 'water spread out,' from the many springs forming marshy areas). A large prehistoric pueblo ruin on a low elevation between two washes entering Forestdale cr. from the n., on the White Mtn. Apache res., 10 m. s. e. of Showlow, Ariz. It was partially excavated in 1901 by Dr Walter Hough, of the National Museum, who is inclined to the belief that it was a settlement of a Zuñi clan or clans on its northward migration. See Nat. Mus. Rep. 1901, 289, 1903.

Forestdale ruin.—Ibid.

Tundy. See Tutemy.

Tunessassah ('where there is fine sand.'—Hewitt). An Iroquois village formerly on upper Allegheny r., perhaps in Warren co., Pa., and occupied by Seneca, Cayuga, and Onondaga.—Macauley, N. Y., II, 200, 299, 300, 1829.

Tung. The Sun clan of the Tewa pueblo of Hano, N. E. Ariz., only one individual (a man) of which survived in 1893.

Tañ'.—Fewkes in Am. Anthr., VII, 166, 1894.

Tda'-wu.—Stephen in 8th Rep. B. A. E., 39, 1891 (Hopi name). Tjon-a-ai'.—Ibid. (Navaho name). Tuñ.—Ibid.

Tungge (Tewa: 'village of the basket'). A former pueblo of the Tano on a bare slope near the banks of a stream (which in the mountains farther s. is called Rio de San Pedro, lower down Uña de Gato, and in the vicinity of the ruins Arroyo del Tunque), at the N. E. extremity of the Sandia mts., in Sandoval co., N. Mex. It was the westernmost of the Tano villages in prehistoric times, and was evidently in ruins in 1541, the date of Coronado's expedition, having been abandoned a few years prior to that date in consequence of an attack by nomadic Indians from the plains. The pueblo was extensive, forming a number of irregular squares, and the houses were constructed of adobe with rubble foundations. See Bandelier in Arch. Inst. Papers, IV, 109, 121, et seq., 1892.

El Tunque.—Bandelier, op. cit., 109. Pueblo de Tunque.—Doc. of 1770 cited by Bandelier, ibid., 112.

Tungulungsi (Tung-ul-ung'-si, 'smallest turtle'). A subclan of the Delawares.—Morgan, Anc. Soc., 172, 1877.

Tungyaa. According to tradition of the Santa Clara Indians, an ancient Tewa pueblo on a black mesa near the w. bank of the Rio Grande, above the San Ildefonso ford, N. Mex. (F. W. H.)

Tuniakpuk. A Togiagmiut Eskimo village on lower Togiak r., Alaska; pop. 137 in 1880.

Tuniakhpuk.—Petroff in 10th Census Alaska, map, 1884. Tuniakpuk.—Baker, Geog. Dict. Alaska, 641, 1906. Tunniakhpuk.—Petroff, op. cit., 17.

Tunica (ta, an article; uni, 'people'; ka, nominal suffix.—Gatschet). A tribe, forming a distinct linguistic family known as Tonikan, formerly dwelling on the lower Mississippi. The Tunica are prominent in the early history of the lower Mississippi region because of their attachment to the French and the faithful service rendered them as allies in contests with neighboring tribes. When first visited they lived in Mississippi on lower Yazoo r. In 1699 La Source (Shea, Early Voy., 80, 1861) estimated the number of their cabins at about 260, scattered over 4 leagues of country. He states that they lived entirely on Indian corn and did no hunting. Gravier, who visited the tribe in 1700, states that they occupied 7 hamlets containing 50 or 60 small cabins. In 1706, according to La Harpe, the Tunica were driven from their villages by the Chickasaw and Alibamu and joined the Huma; and it is said that subsequently they killed more than half that tribe and occupied its territory. In 1730 they met with a reverse at the hands of those Natchez who had taken refuge among the Chickasaw; their village was burned and a large number of them killed. In 1760 they occupied 3 villages, the largest of which was on a lake at Tunica bayou. Baudry des Lozières in 1802 ascribed to them a population of 120 men, a total of about 450.

Hutchins (Imlay, West. Ter., 419, 1797) notes a Tunica village on the E. bank of the river opposite the upper plantations of Pte Coupée, containing in 1784 about 20 warriors. Later the Tunica moved up to Marks ville prairie in Avoyelles parish, on the s. side of lower Red r. Still later they appear under the local name of Avoyelles Indians (not to be confounded with an older tribe of that name), a name applied also to the Biloxi, who settled here in 1762 after leaving their coast seats. The remnant of the Tunica, consisting of about 30 people, are now E. and S. E. of Marks ville, the parish seat, on what is called Marks ville prairie. They speak Tunica, Creole, and English.

Gravier's description of the Tunica in 1700 indicates that their women made an excellent fabric of mulberry cloth; there was a fair division of labor between the sexes; the men cultivated the soil, planted and harvested the crops, cut the wood and brought it to the cabin, and dressed the deer and buffalo skins; the women performed the indoor work and made pottery and clothing; polygyny was rare among them (Shea, Early Voy., 134). The Tunica language, hitherto unknown or unpublished, was studied in 1886 by Gatschet. It is vocalic and harmonious, rich in verbal forms and possessing also a declension of the noun, and, what is more remarkable, nominal and pronominal gender. It appears to have no genetic connection with any other family of languages.

Tunuliarbik. A former Eskimo settlement and Dutch trading station in s. w. Greenland.—Crantz, Hist. Greenland, i, 18, 1767.

Tununirmiut ('people of the back country'). One of the two subdivisions of the Agomiut Eskimo, living at Pond inlet, opening into Eclipse sd., N. E. coast of Baffinland.

Toonoonek.—Parry, Second Voy., 359, 1824. Tudnunirmiut.—Boas in Trans. Anthr. Soc. Wash., iii, 96, 1885. Tununirmiut.—Boas in 6th Rep. B. A. E., 442, 1888.

Tununirusirmiut ('people of the smaller back country'). A subtribe of Agomiut Eskimo living at Admiralty inlet, the n. shore of Cockburn id., and the s. shore of North Devon.

Toonoonee-roochiuh.—Parry, Second Voy., 370, 1824. Tudnunirossirmiut.—Boas in Trans. Anthr. Soc. Wash., iii, 96, 1885. Tununirusirmiut.—Boas in 6th Rep. B. A. E., 442, 1888.

Tunxis (from Wuttunkshan, 'the point where the river bends.'—Trumbull). An important tribe that lived on middle Farmington r. near the great bend, about where Farmington and Southington, Hartford co., Conn., are now. They were subject at an early period to Sequassen, the sachem who sold Hartford to the English. Rutenber includes them in the Wappinger. They sold the greater part of their territory in 1640. About 1700 they still had a village of 20 wigwams at Farmington, but in 1761 there were only 4 or 5 families left.

Junks'es.—Wadungum, a Mohegan chief (1700), in N. Y. Doc. Col. Hist., iv, 614, 1854 (misprint). Sepos.—Stiles (1761) in *Mass. Hist. Soc. Tupichihasao. A mission village, probably on the lower Georgia coast, the inhabitants of which were among those revolting against the Spaniards in 1687.—Barcia, Ensayo, 287, 1723.

Tupirbikdjuin. A summer settlement of the Kingnait Okomiut Eskimo near the coast of Cumberland sd.—Boas in 6th Rep. B. A. E., map, 1888.

Tupo. A former rancheria, probably Papago or Sobaipuri, 12 to 16 leagues w. of San Xavier del Bac.; visited by Father Kino in 1696.

Cops.—Mange (1701) quoted by Bancroft, Ariz. and N. Mex., i, 358, 1889. Tupo.—Kino (1696) in Doc. Hist. Mex., 4th s., i, 266, 1856. Tups.—Mange quoted by Bancroft, Ariz. and N. Mex., 358, 1889.

Tupo. A former rancheria, apparently Papago, visited by Kino and Mange in 1701. Situated in a volcanic desert about 10 m. from the Gulf of California, N. w. Sonora, Mexico.

Aibacusi.—Kino (1701) quoted by Bancroft, No. Mex. States, i, 495, 1884. Tupo.—Ibid.

Tups. A tribe of Karankawan affiliation that entered Nuestra Señora de la Candelaria mission (q. v.) on San Gabriel r., Texas, in 1750. In the same locality there were three missions, one avowedly assigned to Tonkawan tribes, the second to the Bidai-Arkokisa group, and the third, La Candelaria, to the Karankawan group. The tribes represented there were the Coco, Karankawa, Tups, Cujane, Estepisas, and Esquein (Testimonio de Diligencias, doc. 12, leg. 6, letter K, Arch. Col. Santa Cruz de Querétaro; Letter of Fray María Año de los Dolores, 1750, ibid., doc. 18). After Candelaria mission was abandoned, a part of the tribe went with the Cocos to San Antonio de Valero. See Topo. (H. E. B.)

Thopa.—Pedro Ramon in doc. 10, leg. 6, letter K, Arch. Col. Santa Cruz, ca. 1756. Tup.—Morfi, Mem. Hist. Tex., bk. II, ca. 1782, MS.

Tupuic. A village, presumably Costanoan, formerly connected with Dolores mission, San Francisco, Cal.—Taylor in Cal. Farmer, Oct. 18, 1861.

Tupuinto. A village, presumably Costanoan, formerly connected with Dolores mission, San Francisco, Cal.—Taylor in Cal. Farmer, Oct. 18, 1861.

Tupustikutteh (Tu-pūs'-ti-kut'-teh, 'grass-nut eaters'). A Paviotso band formerly on Carson r., w. Nevada.—Powers, Inds. W. Nevada, MS., B. A. E., 1876.

Tuquisan. A Maricopa settlement on Gila r., s. Ariz., in the 18th century.—Orozco y Berra, Geog., 348, 1864.

Turami. A Costanoan village formerly within 10 m. of Santa Cruz mission, Cal.—Taylor in Cal. Farmer, Apr. 5, 1860.

Turasi ('where there are peaches'). A small pueblo of the Tarahumare, near Norogachic, Chihuahua, Mexico.—Lumboltz, inf'n, 1894.

Turatu. The Elk clan of Taos pueblo, N. Mex.

Tura'tu tai'na.—M. C. Stevenson, notes, B. A. E., 1910 (tai'na = 'people').

Turco. See Turk.

Turghestitsatun. A Tolowa village on the Pacific coast n. of the mouth of Klamath r., Cal.

Ta-képl'-tūn jūn'-né.—Dorsey, Chetco MS. vocab., B. A. E., 1884. Ta-képl'-taa te'-ne.—Dorsey, Smith River MS. vocab., B. A. E., 1884. Tū-rxésti' taa'-tān.—Dorsey, Naltunnetunne MS. vocab., B. A. E., 1884.

Turip. A Yurok village on Klamath r., about 8 m. above the mouth, in N. w. California. (A. L. K.)

Turisai. A former rancharia, probably of the Sobaipuri, and a visita of the Jesuit mission of Suamea. Probably situated on or near the Rio Santa Cruz in s. Arizona or N. Sonora.

S. Pedro Turisai.—Bancroft, Ariz. and N. Mex., 371, 1889 (after early docs.).

Turk. A nickname (El Turco) given by the members of Coronado's expedition in 1540-42 to a native of the province of Harahey (identified with the Pawnee country), because of his peculiar head-dress. The Turk, who was a "slave" at Pecos pueblo (Cicuyé), N. Mex., probably first because of a desire to return to his people, later at the instigation of the Pueblos who had suffered atrocities at the hands of the Spaniards, represented to Coronado that in Quivira, and especially in Harahey and "the Guaes," there was much gold, which he called acochis (q. v.). Fired with enthusiasm at what the Indian had told him, Coronado started with his army from Tiguex on the Rio Grande the following spring (1541), guided by the Turk and accompanied by a Quivira Indian named Yeopete. After wandering for some time on the Staked plains of E. New Mexico and w. Texas, Coronado became convinced that the Turk was trying to lead the army astray, whereon he put him in irons, sent back to the Rio Grande the main body of his force, placed himself under the guidance of Ysopete, and in 42 days of northward journeying reached the country of Quivira, in the present Kansas. Traversing the length of this province, Coronado, after the middle of August, reached Kansas r., whence he summoned Tatarrax, chief of Harahey, which lay next beyond. Regardless of the presence of Tatarrax with 200 warriors of the tribe to which the Turk belonged, and whom the latter endeavored to set against the Spanish force of 30 men, the treacherous guide was strangled to death, and Coronado prepared for his return journey. (F. W. H.)

Turquoise. Stones of greenish hue were especially valued by the American aborigines, and this was due, apparently, to the association of certain religious notions with the color. Turquoise is one of the most beautiful of the green gem stones, and, according to Clark and Diller, is a hydrous aluminum sulphate colored by a copper phosphate, containing also a little iron and magnesia. It displays a wide range of pale bluish and greenish tints, and occurs in thin seams or in pockets associated with eruptive rocks, or as grains and pebbles in the sands and gravels of the valleys. It is found in various localities, notably in Colorado, New Mexico, Utah, Nevada, and California, and was mined by the natives in pre-Spanish times at Cerrillos mt., near Santa Fe, N. Mex. (Blake), and on Turquoise mt. in Cochise co., Ariz.

The first Spanish explorers found this stone in use for personal ornaments by the native tribes, and it appears that they had been conducting mining operations on quite an extensive scale, especially at Los Cerrillos, N. Mex., where many of their rude stone mining hammers and sledges have been found (see Mines and Quarries). It is even surmised that the more highly civilized tribes of Mexico found and utilized this source of the much-valued gem. The turquoise is highly prized by the present tribes of the arid region, and is ground into beads and pendants, which are pierced by the aid of primitive drills, and is made into settings for mosaic work (see Mosaic). Kunz states that "the selling price is now [1886] very low, the Indians disposing of their specimens at the rate of 25 cents for the contents of a mouth, where they usually carry them. A string made of many hundreds of stones they value at the price of a pony." See Utahlite.

Tuscarawas. A former settlement of Delawares and Wyandot on Tuscarawas r., Ohio, near the mouth of Big Sandy r. It was near the great trail leading from Muskingum on the s. and Sandusky on the n. to the Indian settlements in w. Pennsylvania, being situated almost due w. from Shingas Town at the mouth of Beaver r. The early traders gave the name Muskingum, or Elk's Eye, to the three streams now known as the Muskingum, Tuscarawas, and Big Sandy. On account of its location near the intersection of the three trails, this settlement, which was made some time before 1750, was well known to traders. Gist passed through it in the year named on his way to Muskingum, when it was composed of a few wigwams. After 1758, when Tamaque (q. v.), or King Beaver, the leading chief of the Delawares on the Ohio, left w. Pennsylvania on account of the fall of Ft Duquesne, he made this his headquarters, and from this time the place was frequently spoken of as "The Beavers Town." After Zeisberger and his Delaware converts deserted the Moravian settlement on Beaver r., Pa., they moved to the Tuscarawas valley, which at once became the center of missionary effort among the western Indians. Tamaque became one of the converts. The Moravian missionary Heckewelder labored for many years in this field, during which time he had many narrow escapes from death at the hands of hostile Indians led by the white renegade Simon Girty. Heckewelder says: "In the year 1762, while I lived at Tuscarawas on the Muskingum, they [the Delawares] were settled on that river and its branches." Bouquet's force encamped near the place in Oct. 1764, at which time it was entirely deserted by its inhabitants, who had fled in terror before the advancing army, leaving about 100 wigwams, an evidence of their numbers. At this time the village had been occupied by a mixed population of about 150 families of Delawares, Shawnee, Wyandot, Miami, and Mingos. McCullough speaks of the settlement at this time where a "number of traders resided" (McCullough, Narr., in Border Life, 104, 1839; see also the Journal of Bouquet Expedition, 13, 1765; Parkman, Conspiracy of Pontiac, II, 227, 1901, and letter of General Gage, ibid., app. F). A number of Indians met Bouquet at Tuscarawas, making overtures for peace. The army moved on to Muskingum, where a council was held, after which a number of white prisoners were given up and hostages given for the return of all prisoners at Ft Pitt in the coming spring. Many of the Indian warriors followed their former captives, whom they had learned to hold in high regard, back to Ft Pitt, but many of these captives returned not long afterward to their Indian homes on the Tuscarawas. Tuscarora (Skarû'rëw', 'hemp gatherers,' the Apocynum cannabinum, or Indian hemp, being a plant of many uses among the Carolina Tuscarora; the native form of this appellative is impersonal, there being no expressed pronominal affix to indicate person, number, or gender). Formerly an important confederation of tribes, speaking languages cognate with those of the Iroquoian linguistic group, and dwelling, when first encountered, on the Roanoke, Neuse, Taw (Torhunta or Nanhontes), and Pamlico rs., N. C. The evidence drawn from the testimony of writers contemporary with them, confirmed in part by tradition, makes it appear that while occupying this primitive habitat the Tuscarora league was composed of at least three tribal constituent members each bearing an independent and exclusive appellation. The names of these component members still survive in the traditions of the Tuscarora now dwelling in w. New York and s. Ontario, Canada. The first of these tribal names is Kâ'timû'â'kû', i. e. 'People of the Submerged Pine-tree'; the second Akaurû'it'âkû' (meaning doubtful); and the third, Skarû'rëw', 'Hemp Gatherers.' Cusick (Hist. Six Nations, 34, 1828) wrote these tribal appellations "Kautanohaksu," "Kauwetseka," and "Tuscarora" respectively, and (p. 31) refers also to the "Esaurora, or Tuscarora," from which it may be inferred that Esaurora is a synonym of Skarû'rëw'. According to the same authority (p. 36), the Tuscarora, on traditionary evidence, possessed in early times the "country lying between the sea shores and the mountains, which divide the Atlantic states," in which they had 24 large towns and could muster 6,000 warriors, probably meaning persons. Lawson, a better authority, wrote that in 1708 the Tuscarora had 15 towns and about 1,200 warriors—perhaps a minimum estimate of the true number of their fighting-men; and Johnson (Legends, etc., of the Iroquois, 1881) says that the Tuscarora in North Carolina had 6 towns and 1,200 warriors, which was probably approximately true of the Tuscarora proper. Col. Barnwell, the commander of the South Carolina forces in the war of 1711-12, said that the Tuscarora or "the enemy can't be less than 1,200 or 1,400 [warriors], which may be easily judged by their large settlements;" but Gov. Spotswood of Virginia placed their fighting strength at 2,000 men in 1711. According to Barnwell the Tuscarora had 3 towns on Pamlico r., of which one was Ucouhnerunt, but that most of their towns were on Neuse r. and its many affluents. Some indication of the extent of the territory claimed by the Tuscarora may be obtained from the terms of the truce declared between the Tuscarora and Col. Barnwell in 1712. It was agreed therein that the Tuscarora were "to plant only on Neuse river, the creek the fort is on, quitting all claims to other lands. . . . To quit all pretensions to planting, fishing, hunting or ranging to all lands lying between Neuse river and Cape Fear, that entirely to be left to the So. Carolina Indians, and to be treated as enemies if found in those ranges without breach of peace, and the enemy's line shall be between Neuse and Pamlico . . . fishing on both sides Bear river." This would indicate that Cape Fear r. was the southern boundary of the Tuscarora territory.

History. The data for the history of the Tuscarora are meager and fragmentary, hence while they were at first an important people of North Carolina, little is definitely known regarding them, and that little usually applies to only a part of the people. The first authentic information concerning the Tuscarora is that recorded by Lawson, the Surveyor-General of North Carolina, who knew them well, having lived in close contact with them for many years. His History of Carolina, having been written about 1709 and published in 1718, contains nothing in regard to the Tuscarora during the most eventful period of their history, namely, that covering the years 1711 to 1713. During this time they fought two wars with the colonists of North Carolina, who were effectively aided by those of South Carolina and Virginia, reenforced by their tributary Indian allies. The first war began with the capture of Lawson and the Baron De Graffenried by about 60 Tuscarora and the condemnation to death of the former in Sept. 1711. Immediately following, a portion of the Tuscarora under Hencock, the Coree, Pamlico, Matamuskeet, Bear Rivers, and Machapungo, conspired to cut off the whites, each one of the tribes agreeing to operate in its own district whence they were being driven by the steady encroachment of the colonists. This compact resulted in the massacre of about 130 of the colonists on Sept. 22, 1711, on Trent and Pamlico rs., by the tribes mentioned. Col. Barnwell was sent by South Carolina to aid the hard-pressed colonists of North Carolina, and succeeded in driving the Tuscarora into one of their palisaded towns about 20 m. above Newbern, N. C., where he defeated them and later induced them to accept terms of peace; but Barnwell violated this treaty by seizing some of the Indians and sending them away into slavery. This was the beginning of the second war between the Tuscarora and their allies and the people of North Carolina. Again an appeal was made to South Carolina for aid, which responded by sending Col. James Moore with a small militia force and about 900 tributary Indians.

Of the Tuscarora, Lawson said that they possessed many amiable qualities; that, in fact, they were "really better to us than we have been to them, as they always freely give us of their victuals at their quarters, while we let them walk by our doors hungry, and do not often relieve them. We look upon them with disdain and scorn, and think them little better than beasts in human form; while with all our religion and education, we possess more moral deformities and vices than these people do." This attitude of the whites toward the Indians naturally led to the troubles later, which ended in much bloodshed and cruelty on both sides. Although the Tuscarora were regarded as mild, kind, peaceable, ingenious, and industrious, they were speedily brutalized by the vices of the colonists with whom they came in contact; their women were debauched by the whites, and both men and women were kidnapped to be sold into slavery. The colonists of North Carolina, like their Puritan brethren of New England, did not recognize in the Indian any right to the soil, hence the lands of the Tuscarora and of their Indian neighbors and allies were appropriated without thought of purchase. It is not strange, therefore, that such conduct on the part of the whites should eventually have awakened distrust and jealousy in the minds of the erstwhile amiable Tuscarora, which, fomented by these and other grievances, finally ripened into a hatred which led to resistance and reprisal.

Perhaps the most lucid and condensed statement of the wrongs suffered by the Tuscarora before vainly attempting to right them is contained in a petition made to the Provincial Government of Pennsylvania in 1710. More than a year before the massacre of 1711 the Tuscarora had officially formulated a number of proposals embodying their grievances and their desire to have these adjusted or removed by the conclusion of peace, and to this end they sent, through the Conestoga (Susquehanna), an embassy with these pacific overtures to the people and government of Pennsylvania. The governor and provincial council dispatched two commissioners to meet this embassy at Conestoga on June 8, 1710, where, in addition to the Tuscarora emissaries, they found Civility and four other Conestoga chiefs, and Opessa, the head chief of the Shawnee. In the presence of these officials the Tuscarora ambassadors delivered their proposals, attested by eight wampum belts, at the same time informing the Pennsylvania commissioners that these were sent as an overture for the purpose of asking for a cessation of hostilities until the following spring, when their chiefs and headmen would come in person "to sue for the peace they so much desired." By the first belt, the elder women and the mothers besought the friendship of the Christian people, the Indians and the government of Pennsylvania, so they might fetch wood and water without risk or danger. By the second, the children born and those about to be born, implored for room to sport and play without the fear of death or slavery. By the third, the young men asked for the privilege to leave their towns without the fear of death or slavery to hunt for meat for their mothers, their children, and the aged ones. By the fourth, the old men, the elders of the people, asked for the consummation of a lasting peace, so that the forest (the paths to other tribes) be as safe for them as their palisaded towns. By the fifth, the entire tribe asked for a firm peace. By the sixth, the chiefs asked for the establishment of a lasting peace with the government, people, and Indians of Pennsylvania, whereby they would be relieved from "those fearful apprehensions they have these several years felt." By the seventh, the Tuscarora begged for a "cessation from murdering and taking them," so that thereafter they would not fear "a mouse, or anything that ruffles the leaves." By the eighth, the tribe, being strangers to the people and government of Pennsylvania, asked for an official path or means of communication between them.

Stripped of metaphor and the language of diplomacy, the purport of this message is plain; it was the statement of a tribe at bay, that in view of the large numbers of their people who were being kidnapped to be sold into slavery or who were being killed while seeking to defend their offspring and their friends and kindred, they desired to remove to a more just and friendly government than that whence they came. At this time there was no war between them and the white people; there had as yet been no massacre by the Tuscarora, no threat of hostility on the part of the Indians, yet to maintain peace and to avoid the impending shedding of blood, they were even then willing to forsake their homes. The commissioners of Pennsylvania, however, informed the delegates, among other things, that "to confirm the sincerity of their past carriage toward the English, and to raise in us a good opinion of them, it would be very necessary to procure a certificate from the government they leave, to this, of their good behaviour, and then they might be assured of a favourable reception" (Min. Prov. Coun. Pa., II, 511, 1852). The Conestoga ("Seneques") chiefs present at this conference stated that by the advice of their council it had been determined to send these belts, brought by the Tuscarora, to the Five Nations. It was the reception of the belts with their pitiful messages by these Five Nations that moved the latter to take steps to shield and protect the Tuscarora, which gave so much apprehension to the northern colonies.

The rapid encroachment of the whites on the lands of the Tuscarora and their Indian neighbors for a period of sixty years after the first settlements, although there was an air of peace and harmony between the two races, were wrongs which dwarfed in comparison with the continued practice of kidnapping their young to be sold into slavery. This was the true cause of the so-called Tuscarora war in 1711-13. This phase of the question is overlooked or quite disregarded by most historians; but years before the massacre of 1711, Tuscarora Indians were brought into Pennsylvania and sold as slaves, a transaction that excited grave apprehension in the minds of the resident Indian tribes. To allay as much as possible this growing terror among them, the provincial council of Pennsylvania enacted in 1705 that, "Whereas the importation of Indian slaves from Carolina, or other places, hath been observed to give the Indians of this province some umbrage for suspicion and dissatisfaction," such importation be prohibited after Mar. 25, 1706. This enactment was based solely on expediency and self-interest, since it was evident that the Indians to the southward were in a general commotion. During the Tuscarora war an act was passed, June 7, 1712, forbidding the importation of Indians, but providing for their sale as slaves to the highest bidder in case any should be imported for that purpose. It is known that the prisoners of Col. Barnwell and Col. Moore were all sold as slaves, even the northern colonies being canvassed for a market for them; indeed, the Boston News Letter of 1713 contained an advertisement offering these very Indians for purchase.

According to De Graffenried, Surveyor-General Lawson in 1709-10 settled his people, the Swiss and Palatines, on the s. bank of Trent r., on a tongue of land called Chattawka, formed by the Trent and the Neuse in North Carolina, in a hot and unhealthful situation. De Graffenried bitterly complained that the Surveyor-General was dishonest for having charged him a "heavy price" for it, and for the consequences of his not knowing that Lawson had no title to the land and that the place was still inhabited by the Indians, although the Surveyor-General had attested that the land was free of encumbrance and unoccupied. This encroachment on the Indian lands was one of the fundamental causes of the so-called Tuscarora war. It is well known that the Corree, together with their close allies, the hostile Tuscarora, in 1711 took vengeance on the Swiss and Palatines settled on Trent r., killing about 70 of them, wounding many others, and destroying much of their property. De Graffenried says that one of the several causes of the war was the "rough treatment of some turbulent Carolinians, who cheated those Indians in trading, and would not allow them to hunt near their plantations, and under that pretense took away from them their game, arms, and ammunition," and that the despised Indians being "insulted in many ways by a few rough Carolinians, more barbarous and inhuman than the savages themselves, could not stand such treatment any longer, and began to think of their safety and of vengeance. What they did they did very secretly."

In a letter of Maj. Christopher Gale to his brother, Nov. 2, 1711, he describes a condition, fairly representative of the times, as to the relations between the whites and the Indians around them. During an attack on one of the many small garrisons maintained for the protection of the settlements, "a number of Indian prisoners of a certain nation, which we did not know, whether they were friends or enemies, rose in the garrison, but were soon cut to pieces, as those on the outside repelled. In the garrison were killed 9 men, and soon after 39 women and children sent off for slaves." This shows that for the purposes of slavery little distinction, if any, was made between one tribe and another.

De Graffenried, while a captive among the hostile Tuscarora, negotiated, subsequent to the execution of the unfortunate Lawson, a private treaty with them by offering to every one of the chiefs of the 10 villages of the hostiles a cloth jerkin, 2 bottles of powder, 500 grains of small shot, 2 bottles of rum, and something more to the head chief for his own ransom. Among other things he agreed to remain neutral during the continuance of the war, and that he, the "said Governor of the German colony promises to remain within his limits and to take no more lands from them without due warning to the king [head chief] and his nation." Thus De Graffenried admitted taking Indian lands without consulting the Indians, although he says elsewhere, "It must be observed that it was neither I, nor my colony, who were the cause of that terrible slaughter or Indian war," apparently overlooking the fact that the greatest massacre was among his own Swiss and Palatines, indicating that the Indians thus resented the wrongs committed by him and his people.

In order to secure the aid of the Catawba ("Flatheads") against the hostile Tuscarora, the Carolina authorities promised them that in the event of success in the war the Indians were to obtain goods "cheaper than formerly." But after faithfully aiding the Carolinians in 1711-13 in dispersing the hostile Tuscarora, the Catawba were deceived as to the promised reduction in the price of goods sold to them, and from this misunderstanding arose the troubles leading later to the Catawba war in 1714-15 (N. Y. Doc. Col. Hist., v, 444, 1855).

The chiefs of the Five Nations, in conference with Gov. Hunter at Albany, Sept. 25, 1714, acquainted him with the fact that the "Tuscarora Indians are come to shelter themselves among the Five Nations; they were of us and went from us long ago, and now are returned and promise to live peaceably among us. And since there is peace now everywhere, we have received them. Do give a belt of wampum. We desire you to look upon the Tuscaroras that are come to live among us as our children, who shall obey our commands and live peaceably and orderly" (N. Y. Doc. Col. Hist., v, 387, 1855). This proposal, for it was practically such, was not yet accepted by the New York Government in 1715 (ibid., 413).

On June 23, 1712, Gov. Hunter, of New York, wrote to the Lords of Trade that "the war betwixt the people of North Carolina and the Tuscarora Indians is like to embroil us all," and expressed the fear that under French instigation the Five Nations would fulfill their threat to join the Tuscarora (ibid., 343). Again, on Sept. 10, 1713, Hunter wrote to Secretary Popple that "the Five Nations are hardly to be diswaded from sheltering the Tuscaruro Indians, which would embroil us all," and expressed regret that he had no funds with which to buy presents to be employed in dissuading them from forming an alliance with the Tuscarora.

On Sept. 10, 1713, an Onondaga chief, in conference with commissioners from Gov. Hunter at Onondaga, said: "Brother Corlaer says the Queen's subjects towards the South are now at war with the tuscarorase Indians. These Indians went out heretofore from us, and have settled themselves there; now they have got into war and are dispersed. . . . They have abandoned their Castles and are scattered hither and thither; let that suffice; and we request our Brother Corlaer to act as mediator between the English of Carrellyna and the tuskaroras that they may no longer be hunted down, and we assure that we will oblige them not to do the English any more harm, for they are no longer a Nation with a name, being once dispersed" (N. Y. Doc. Col. Hist., v, 376, 1855).

In 1717 Gov. Hunter, of New York, informed the Five Nations that there were Virginia traders who still bartered with the Tuscarora, thus showing that, contrary to the common opinion, there were still a part of these Indians in Carolina and s. Virginia.

In a letter dated at Narhantes Fort, Feb. 4, 1712, Col. Barnwell gives a list of the various tribes of Southern Indians who composed his motley army. In his own spelling these were: the Yamasses, Hog Logees, Apalatchees, Corsaboy, Watterees, Sagarees, Catawbass, Suterees, Waxams, Congarees, Sattees, Pedees, Weneaws, Cape Feare, Hoopengs, Wareperes, Saraws, and Saxapahaws. Ft Narhantes, according to Barnwell, was the largest and most warlike town of the Tuscarora. It was situated about 27 m. below a former settlement of the Saxapahaw or "Shacloe Indians," which these Indians had been forced to abandon along with others at the beginning of Feb. 1712, by the Narhantes Tuscarora who had fallen upon them and had killed 16 persons, owing to the refusal of the Saxapahaw to join the Tuscarora against the English. The Saxapahaw had just reached the Wattomas when Barnwell arrived there. After reaching Neuse r. Barnwell numbered his men before crossing, and found that he had 498 Indians and 33 white men. He complained that there was a great desertion of the Indians; that only 67 remained of Capt. Bull's 200. On taking Ft Narhantes, "head Town of ye Tuscaruros," on Jan. 30, 1712, he and his men were greatly surprised and puzzled to find within two log houses much stronger than the outer fort. After gaining an entrance, he says, while "we were putting the men to the sword, our Indians got all the slaves and the plunder, only one girl we gott." This was the strongest fort in that part of the country. His loss was 7 white men killed and at least 32 wounded; the Indian loss was 6 killed and 28 wounded; the Tuscarora loss was 52 men killed and at least 10 women, and 30 prisoners. Barnwell was much chagrined at his great loss, "with no greater execution of ye enemy." De Graffenried, in speaking of this encounter, says he "marched against a great Indian village, called Core, about 30 miles distant from Newbern, drove out the King and his forces, and carried the day with such fury, that, after they had killed a great many, in order to stimulate themselves still more, they cooked the flesh of an Indian 'in good condition' and ate it." So it appears that Narhantes was a Coree village, whose King was called Cor Tom. Barnwell then advanced on Catechna, or King Hencock's town, in which had taken refuge a medley of Indians from the Weetock, Bay, Neuse, Cor, Pamlico, and a portion of the Tuscarora tribe. After two assaults, which the Indians successfully repulsed, Barnwell, in order to save from massacre the white prisoners within the fort, induced the Indians to enter into a truce with him on condition that the white prisoners be liberated; and he returned to Newbern with his small army for refreshment. Barnwell had hoped for great honors and gifts from North Carolina, but being disappointed in this hope, and wishing to return home with his forces with some profit, he lured, under pretence of peace, a large number of the Indians to the neighborhood of Cor village and then broke the truce by capturing them and carrying them away to be sold into slavery. This naturally incensed the Tuscarora and other Carolina Indians, and caused them to lose all confidence in the word of a white man. This change of affairs resulted in repeated raids by the Indians along Neuse and

Pamlico rs., and "the last troubles were worse than the first."

Solicitations by the North Carolina authorities were made to the Government of South Carolina for new aid, which was granted, under Colonel Moore, with a body of 33 white men and more than 900 Indian allies, who were probably reenforced by North Carolina recruits. His objective point was the palisaded town of Catechna, or Hencock's village. In a letter dated Mar. 27, 1713, to President Pollock of North Carolina, just after he had taken the palisaded town of "Neoheroka" in Greene co., N. C., which lay on his route to Catechna, he reported that the attack was begun on the 20th and that on the morning of the 23d "wee had gott ye fort to ye ground." He states that the prisoners taken were 392, that the scalps taken in the fort numbered 192, that there were 200 killed and burned in the fort, and 166 persons killed and taken "out of ye fort on ye Scout," a total of 950. His own loss was 22 white men killed and 36 wounded; the loss of his Indians was 35 killed and 58 wounded. This severe loss so awed the Tuscarora that they abandoned fort "C'ohunche," situated at Hencock's town, and migrated northward toward the territory of the Five Nations.

Prior to the arrival of Col. Moore, President Pollock had entered into an arrangement with Tom Blunt, the leading chief of the "Northern Tuscarora," to seize chief Hencock, who was the reputed head of the hostile Tuscarora, and to bring him alive to the President for the purpose of adjusting their mutual difficulties and to negotiate peace. Blunt's Tuscarora were to destroy the hostiles who had taken part in the massacre and to deliver hostages for their own good behavior—this arrangement was to continue only until the new year. After the defeat of the Tuscarora by Moore, another treaty was made with Tom Blunt and his Tuscarora, thus leaving as hostile only the small tribes of the Coree, Matamuskeet, and Catechna. All of Moore's Indians except about 180 returned to South Carolina to sell their captives into slavery. With the remaining forces Moore soon reduced and drove away the few remaining hostiles.

The date of the adoption of the Tuscarora into the council board of the League of the Iroquois, through the Oneida, their political sponsors, is indefinite, judging from the differing dates, ranging from 1712 to 1715, given by various well-informed writers. In their forced migration northward the Tuscarora did not all decamp at once. The hostiles and their most apprehensive sympathizers were most probably the first to leave their ancient homes in North Carolina. On the total defeat and dispersion of the hostile Tuscarora and their allies in 1713, the scattered fragments of tribes fled and sought an asylum with other tribes, among whom their identity was not always maintained. Although the Five Nations gave asylum to the fugitive Tuscarora, there is also abundant evidence that, for political reasons perhaps, the Tuscarora were not for many years after their flight from North Carolina formally admitted into the Council Board of the League of the Five Nations as a constitutive member. The fact is that the Tuscarora were 90 years in removing from their North Carolina home to more friendly dwelling-places in the N., and there is no evidence that they were formally incorporated into the confederation of the Five Nations, as a coequal member, before Sept. 1722. On Sept. 6, 1722, Gov. Burnet held a conference with the Five Nations at Albany, at which Governor Spotswood of Virginia was present. For the purpose of preventing forays between the Five Nations and their allies on the one hand, and the Southern Indians on the other, Spotswood induced the Five Nations to consent to the running of a dividing line along the Potomac and the high ridge of the Allegany mtns. This agreement was made in the name of the Five Nations and the Tuscarora, indicating that the latter had become a factor in the councils of the League of the Iroquois. In closing the conference, it is stated that the Indians "gave six shouts—five for the Five Nations and one for the castle of Tuscaroras, lately seated between the Oneidas and Onondagas." The record continues that at the conclusion of this conference, on Sept. 13, the Five Nations sought a special interview with the Governor of Pennsylvania, and that on Sept. 14 the governor received "the ten chiefs of the Five Nations, being two from each, together with two others, said to be of the Tuscororoës." This appears to be the first official mention of the Tuscarora as taking part in the management of the public affairs of the League. The Tuscarora mentioned here, however, did not include those who dwelt on the Juniata and on the Susquehanna at Oquaga and its environs, nor those still in North Carolina.

In a petition of John Armstrong for land lying in Tuscarora valley on Juniata r., Pa., about 6 m. from the mouth of Tuscarora cr., the Indians living there at that time are called Lakens; this land was taken up by Armstrong on Feb. 3, 1755. On the same day, George Armstrong obtained a warrant for land situated on the s. side of Tuscarora cr., "opposite to the settlement of the Indians called Lackens." It would thus appear that at this date this band of Tuscarora were known, at least locally, as Lakens or Lackens.

Elias Johnson, in his Legends, says that it was the Seneca who first adopted the Tuscarora as a constituent member of the League. This, however, is at variance with the common but authentic traditions of all the tribes and with the official statement of Col. (afterward Sir) William Johnson to the Oneida, made at Mt Johnson, Sept. 8, 1753. He said, "Brethren of Oneida. . . . My best advice is to have your castles as near together as you conveniently can with the Tuscaroras, who belong to you as children, and the Scanihaderadighroones lately come into your alliance or families, which makes it necessary for me to fix a new string to the cradle which was hung up by your forefathers when they received the Tuscaroras, . . . to feed and protect."

After the close of the war of 1711-13 in North Carolina, the neutral Tuscarora, with remnants of allied tribes still remaining in that country, were placed under the rule of chief Tom Blunt, or Blount, by treaty with the provincial government of North Carolina. From an act of the general assembly of North Carolina, in 1778, it is learned that Withmell Tuffdick was then the ruling chief; but the last ruling chief of the North Carolina Tuscarora was Samuel Smith, who died in 1802.

In 1767, the renown of the Moravian mission station at Friedenshuetten (q. v.) in Pennsylvania was so great that many Indians from various tribes, including the Tuscarora, probably from Oquaga, Ingaren, and vicinity, were constantly stopping there. Many passed through it merely to see a place so famous for its hospitality. In May, 1766, 75 Tuscarora, according to Loskiel, on their way from North Carolina, halted here and remained for some weeks. They are described as lazy and "refuse to hear religion." During their stay the Tuscarora were so alarmed at the sight of the first snow that they left their huts down by the river and took refuge with the missionaries. A number of Tuscarora arrived at the mission to remain there; these had planted their crops during 1766 at the mouth of Tuscarora cr., Wyoming co., Pa.

On Dec. 16, 1766, Sir William Johnson received at Mt Johnson, N. Y., 160 Tuscarora who had just arrived from North Carolina. They complained to him that on their way thither they had been robbed at Paxtang, in Pennsylvania, of their horses and other property to the value of about $300.

Later the Tuscarora on the Susquehanna, dwelling at Oquaga and in its vicinity, had lands assigned them by the Oneida, their political sponsors. These lands were bounded on the e. by Unadilla r., on the w. by the Chenango, and on the s. by the Susquehanna. In the northern part of this allotment were situated the towns of Ganasaraga, on the site of Sullivan, Madison co., N. Y., and Kaunehsuntahkeh. A number of the Tuscarora lived with the Oneida in their chief village. On these lands a large portion of the Tuscarora remained until the events of the Revolution displaced them. By the terms of the treaty of Ft Herkimer in 1785 with the state of New York, to which the Tuscarora were nominal parties, the Oneida, the original proprietors of the lands then occupied by the Tuscarora, conveyed to New York the lands of the Tuscarora and retained the proceeds of the sale; thus the Tuscarora were again without a home. Thereafter they became dispersed. Later they had a village, called Junastriyo (Tcunästri' io') in the Genessee valley, below Avon, N. Y.; another, called Jutaneaga (Tcutänēñ' kiä'), at the fork of Chittenango cr.; and another called Kanhato (Kä'n-ha'nü').

According to Johnson (Legends, etc.) a part of the fugitive Tuscarora settled at a point about 2 m. w. of Tamaqua, Schuylkill co., Pa., where they planted apple trees and lived for a number of years. It is probable that it was these Tuscarora who later removed to Oquaga, in the vicinity of which they had three other towns in 1778. Another band of fugitives settled in Tuscarora valley (as it was called later from them), on Juniata r., Pa. They remained here at least as late as 1762. In a minute of a conference held at Lancaster, Pa., Aug. 11, 1762, between Lieut. Gov. Hamilton of Pennsylvania and delegates from the Ohio Delawares, the Tuscarora of Oquaga and Lower Tuscarora, the Shawnee, the Kickapoo, the Wea, and the Miami, it is stated that six Tuscarora were present, of whom three were chiefs, who brought from their people a letter in which they asked the Governor to furnish them with a pass, saying, "We should be glad to be informed of the state and behavior of our brethren in Tuscarora valley, and to have some directions about the way, as we propose to make them a visit, and also should be glad of a pass or recommendation in writing, that we may be friendly received on our way to and at the valley."

Major portions of the Oneida and the Tuscarora, in accordance with standing agreements with the United Colonies, remained faithful to the American cause during the Revolution. When the Indian allies of the British, even some of their brethren of the Six Nations, learned that a majority of the Tuscarora had cast their lot with the Colonies, they invaded the Tuscarora country, burned their lodges, and destroyed their crops and other property. Thus again by the fortunes of war the Tuscarora were scattered and homeless. A large party of these settled at a place called Oyonwayea, or Johnson's Landing, in Niagara co., N. Y., about 4 m. e. of the outlet of Niagara r., at the mouth of Four Mile cr., in order not to be directly among the many Indians friendly to the British cause camped around Ft Niagara. At the close of the war, two families, probably clans, of Tuscarora from Oyonwayea made their way to the n. e. limits of their present reservation, where they found many walnuts and butternuts, and a fine stream. Here they decided to winter. Being missed from Oyonwayea, scouts were sent out, who found them in their newly chosen settlement, a situation so favorable that, after the gratuitous cession of their former home among the Oneida, Oyonwayea was abandoned and all the families removed to the new site. Although the Tuscarora had only a tacit permission from the Seneca to reside at this place, the last settlement became the foundation of the present Tuscarora reservation in New York. At the treaty held at Genessee, Sept. 15, 1797, between Robert Morris and the Seneca tribe, the Tuscarora chiefs complained, for the first time since their admission to the councils of the League, that the Five Nations had from time to time allotted lands to their people, but that each time these lands had been included in a subsequent cession to the whites, and that the Tuscarora had received nothing in return for their right of occupancy or for their improvements. The justice and merits of their complaint having been acknowledged by the Five Nations, Morris reserved to the Tuscarora, by grant, two square miles, covering their settlement on the ridge mentioned above, and the Seneca thereupon granted them an adjoining square mile. About 1800-02 a deputation was sent to North Carolina to learn whether they could obtain funds in payment for the lands they formerly occupied there, with the result that, by aid of the North Carolina legislature, they were able to lease the Carolina lands, which yielded a fund of $13,722. This sum enabled the Secretary of War in 1804, under authority of Congress, to purchase 4,329 acres for the Tuscarora from the Holland Land Co., adjoining the three square miles already occupied by them. Such is the origin of the land holdings of the New York Tuscarora.

It was while the Tuscarora deputation was in North Carolina that the remnant of the tribe still residing there was brought to the N. and joined their brethren in New York state.

The Tuscarora in sympathy with those of the Six Nations that adhered to the cause of Great Britain in the Revolution were granted lands in severalty on Grand River res., Ontario.

The evangelizing work of Christian missionaries began among the Tuscarora in w. New York as early as 1805 under the patronage of the New York Missionary Society. At first there were only six persons among the Tuscarora willing to abjure their ancient faith and customs, at least in name and appearance, and join in the missionary work; the remainder were generally strongly averse to the work of the missionaries. So violent were the struggles between the two unequal parties that in the spring of 1820 the "pagans" succeeded in inducing about 70 persons to emigrate to Canada, where they settled among the pagans of the Six Nations on the Grand River res., Ontario. The church membership at this time was 16 persons. Little progress was apparent in the education of the Tuscarora, although the New York Society had maintained a school among them.

Ethnology.—The Tuscarora in New York are governed by a council of irresponsible chiefs, for the Indians have forgotten and so neglect the means to be employed in enforcing the will of the clan in case a chief fails in his plain duty; the criminal law of New York at this point nullifies the early sovereignty of the clan over its members. In common with the other tribes of the Iroquoian linguistic stock, the Tuscarora traced the descent of blood through the line of the mother, and made the civil and official military chieftainships hereditary in the ohwatcira of certain clans (see Clans) over which the woman chiefs and the elder women presided. The simplest political unit was the ohwatcira, of which one or more constituted a clan, which was the simplest organized political unit. The Tuscarora were constituted of at least eight clans, which primitively were organized into phratries. There are no data, other than those furnished by tradition and analogy, as to the organization of the Tuscarora confederation. The clans were exogamic as to their own members, as were also the phratries in primitive times. The Tuscarora of New York being completely isolated from any of their own people who still profess their ancient dogmas and beliefs and who still practise their ancient rites and ceremonies, have preserved only a hazy recollection of their early customs, ceremonies, and rites; even less do they comprehend the meaning of the ceremonies still practised by the so-called pagan members of cognate tribes. They are all professed Christians, and so turn away from the old forms of thought and practice of their ancestors.

The exact number of clans still existing among the Tuscarora is not definitely known, for the native authorities themselves do not agree on the number and the names of those still recognized—some informants give seven, while others with equal credibility give eight. There is likewise some diversity in regard to the correct names of certain clans. One list has Bear, Wolf, Turtle, Beaver, Deer, Eel, and Snipe; another has Bear, Eel, Large Turtle, Small Turtle, Beaver, Deer, Wolf, and Snipe; still another list has Bear, Eel, Deer, Turtle, Gray Wolf, Yellow Wolf, Beaver, and Snipe; and yet another is like the last, except that the Turtle clan is replaced by the clans Small Turtle and Large Turtle. Like differences appear in the lists of clans of the other Iroquois tribes.

The names of the civil chiefs still in use among the present two divisions of the Tuscarora (that in Ontario and the other in w. New York) are: (A) Sikwari'çrā (Sacharissa), 'The spear trailer'; Ni'hawēñnā'ā, 'His voice is small'; Hotio'kuand'kēñ, 'He holds or grasps the multitude,' or possibly, 'He holds or grasps his own loins'; these three belong to the Turtle clan. (B) Nūkāiēñ'tēñ (signification not clear); Uā-kuā'tēñ'ā, 'The Bear cub'; Ionēñtchā-nēñ'nākēñ, 'Its fore-paw pressed against its breast'; these three belong to the Bear clan. (C) Nāio'kāwe'ā (signification not known); Neiotchā'k'doñ, 'It is bent'; these two belong to the Wolf clan. (D) Karoñdauā'kēñ, 'One is holding the tree'; Thanādāk'hūā (signification not clear); these two belong to the Snipe clan. (E) Kari'hēñ'tiā, 'It goes along teaching'; Ni'hno'kā'uā, 'He anoints the hide'; Nūkā'hēñuā'ç'hēñ, 'It is twenty canoes'; these three belong to the Beaver clan. Among the Canadian Tuscarora on Grand River res., Ontario, the first and last names of the Turtle clan, the first title of the Wolf clan, and the first title of the Snipe clan appear to be the only ones now in use, although these four titles are questionably also in use among the New York Tuscarora.

There is no definite information available as to the former and more complete organization into clan phratries. Some of the translations of the chieftain titles above would seem to indicate that they were originally designations of some habit, attitude, or other characteristic feature of the clan tutelary or patron, questionably called "totem". The clan name, with one or two exceptions, is not the ordinary name of the clan guardian or patron, but is rather descriptive of some feature or attitude, or is the name of the usual habitat, of the tutelary; for example, the name of the Bear clan signifies literally, 'Broken-off tail'; that of the Plover or Killdee (Snipe), 'Clean-sand people'; that of the Beaver, 'People of the stream'; that of the Turtle clan, 'Climbing-the-mountain people,' named from the position of the turtle basking; etc. It is probable that plover or killdee should be substituted in the foregoing lists of clans, for the name clearly refers to the killdee's habit of running along the clean sand at the water's edge.

De Graffenried gives (N. C. Col. Rec., I, 905 et seq.) an interesting account of the preparations made for the execution of Lawson and himself by the hostile Tuscarora. In the open space or public square mentioned there was a large fire, near which was the shaman or high priest, a grizzled sorcerer, who made two white rings on the ground, whether of flour or white sand was not stated. In front of the two victims was placed a wolf skin, and a short distance farther there stood an Indian in a terrifying posture, holding in one hand a knife and in the other a tomahawk; he was apparently the executioner. He did not move from the spot. On the farther side of the fire were assembled young men, women, and children, who danced with weird and frightful contortions and attitudes. In the center of the circle of dancers were seated two singers who intoned a dismal song, "rather fit to provoke tears and anger than joy." Within the circle of dancers the shaman stood unterrified, uttering his threatenings and adjurations and performing his exorcisms, against the foes of his people and their orenda or "medicine," when there would come a pause in the dancing. Finally, with shouts and howls the dancers ran into the neighboring forest. In a short time they returned with their faces painted black, white, and red, in bands, and with their hair loose and flying, oiled and sprinkled with fine down or cotton from the cattail flag and with small white feathers, and some returned arrayed in all kinds of furs. After their return, the dance was renewed. Back of the two victims stood a double line of armed warriors who kept their posts until everything was over; back of this guard was the council of war, whose members were seated on the ground in a circle, gravely deliberating on the fate of the two noted prisoners. Finally, they acted on the advice of "King" Tom Blunt, the head-chief of their neighbors, "the villages of the Tuscaroras," properly so called, that King Hencock should liberate De Graffenried, and could deal with Lawson as he and his council pleased. The manner of Lawson's death, as learned from Indian information, is found in a letter of Maj. Christopher Gale to his brother, Nov. 2, 1711, wherein it is said that the Indians stuck the unfortunate prisoner "full of fine small splinters of torchwood, like hogs' bristles, and so set them gradually on fire." De Graffenried was not permitted to know how Lawson was executed.

To this account of the Tuscarora method of preparing for the execution of captives may be added their triumphal ceremonies which De Graffenried says they performed after their defeat of a relief party of Swiss and Palatines. He reports that they built bonfires at night, and especially a large one in the place of executions, where they raised "three wolf's hides, figuring as many protectors or gods," to which offerings, consisting of their jewels, were made by the women. In the middle of the circle, the chief shaman performed all manner of contortions, conjurations, and imprecations against the enemies of his country, while the populace danced in a circle around the wolf-hides.

The council of "King" Hencock, which consisted of 40 elders, was called by the Tuscarora, according to De Graffenried, the "Assembly of the Great," a translation of the Tuscarora terms for the council of chiefs, the general word for chief signifying 'one is great,' either in size or position. At the council before which Lawson and De Graffenried were tried the "forty elders" were seated around a great fire kindled in a large open space devoted to important festivals and public executions. On this occasion these chiefs and the accused were seated on rush mats, which were customarily provided for the comfort of guests as a mark of deference and honor. Although the two captives were acquitted by the first council, they were again tried before a second council, after Lawson incautiously had had a bitter quarrel with Cor Tom, the chief of Cor town, who was not at the first council. The two captives were not given mats upon which to sit, and Lawson was condemned to death and De Graffenried was acquitted.

Lawson asserts that the most powerful tribe "scorns to treat or trade with any others, of fewer numbers and less power in any other tongue but their own, which serves for the lingua of the country; with which we travel and deal." As an example of this, the Tuscarora are cited. Being the most numerous tribe in North Carolina, their language was necessarily understood by some persons in every town of all the neighboring tribes.

The Tuscarora carried on a pernicious trade in rum with the Indians dwelling to their westward. In 1708 rum had been but recently introduced among the latter, chiefly by the Tuscarora, who transported it in rundlets several hundred miles, amongst other Indians. They sold it at "so many mouthfuls for a buckskin, they never using any other measure," the buyer always choosing a man having the largest mouth possible to accompany him to the market, and the mouthful was scrupulously emptied into a bowl brought for the purpose. The Tuscarora also traded with the Shakori and Occaneechi, selling them wooden bowls and ladles for rawhides.

Their lodges, usually round in form, were constructed of poles, covered with the bark of cypress, red or white cedar, or sometimes pine. At one place Lawson met more than 500 Tuscarora in one body in a hunting camp. They had constructed their lodges with bark, "not with round tops, as they commonly use, but ridge fashion, after the manner of most Indians." Among them he found much corn, while meat and venison were scarce, because of the great number of people, for although they were expert hunters, they were too populous for one range.

According to Lawson, the native Tuscarora of North Carolina had rather flat bodies, due probably to the fact that in early infancy the children were swathed to cradle-boards. He adds: "They are not of so robust and strong bodies as to lift great burdens, and endure labor and slavish work, as Europeans are; yet some that are slaves prove very good and laborious." They were dextrous and steady, and collected in the use of their hands and feet; their bearing was sedate and majestic; their eyes were commonly full and manly, being black or dark hazel in color, and the white of the eye was usually marbled with red lines; their skin was tawny, and somewhat darkened by the habit of anointing it with bear's oil and a pigment resembling burnt cork. When they wished to be very fine they mixed with the oil a certain red powder made from a scarlet root growing in the hilly country. This root was held in great esteem among them, selling it one to another at a very high price, on account of the distance from which it came and the danger to which they were exposed in obtaining it. The Tuscarora and other Indians attempted to cultivate this plant, but it would not grow in their land. As a substitute they sometimes used puccoon root, which also has a crimson color, but this dyed the hair an ugly hue. The heads even of the aged were scarcely ever bald; their teeth were tinged yellow from smoking tobacco, to which habit both men and women were much addicted; they however did not snuff or chew tobacco. They plucked the hair from their faces and bodies. There were but few deformed or crippled persons among them.

The Tuscarora had many dances suitable to various occasions; these as a rule were accompanied with public feasts prepared under the direction of the women chiefs. Every dance had its peculiar song, but probably was not changed for every occasion on which the dance was performed, although Lawson states that "all these songs are made new for every feast; nor is one and the same song sung at two several festivals. Some one of the nation, which has the best gift of expressing their designs, is appointed by their king and war captains to make these songs." To these festivals the people came from all the towns within 50 or 60 m., "where they buy and sell several commodities."

The Tuscarora, in like measure with the northern Iroquois, were passionately given to gaming, frequently stripping one another of every piece of property available. Sometimes they went even so far as to bet themselves away to the winner, readily becoming his slave until he or his relatives could pay the redemption price; nevertheless they bore their losses with great equanimity, no matter how ruinous they were. Among their games was that of a bundle of 51 split reeds about 7 in. in length and neatly made. The game consisted in throwing a part of the bundle before an opponent, who must on sight guess the number thrown. It is said that experts were able to tell the number correctly ten times in ten throws. A set of these reeds was valued at a dressed doe skin. The Tuscarora also had the well-known bowl and plum-seed game, which is such an important adjunct to the thanksgiving festivals of the northern Iroquois. They also had a number of other games, but some of their neighbors had games which they did not have.

There were feasts among the Tuscarora when several villages united to celebrate some event or when two or more tribes assembled to negotiate peace. There were feasts and dances of thanksgiving, and invocations to the gods that watched over their harvests, when their crops were garnered and when the first fruits of the year were gathered.

Population.—No trustworthy estimates of the Tuscarora population at any given date, exclusive of those of Lawson and Barnwell, previous to 1830, are available for the entire Tuscarora people. The earliest and perhaps most authoritative estimate of the total Tuscarora population at a given time was that of Lawson in 1708. His estimate of 15 towns and 1,200 fighting men would indicate a population of about 4,800 at that date; Colonel Barnwell's figures are somewhat larger than Lawson's, though they appear to be conservative; his estimate was 1,200 to 1,400 warriors, or a maximum population of about 5,600 persons. The estimate of Chauvignerie in 1736 was 250 warriors, or about 1,000 persons. His estimate was restricted to the Tuscarora living near Oneida, N. Y., hence did not include those living in North Carolina or on the Susquehanna and Juniata rs. Other estimates of this group give them 1,000 (1765), 2,000 (1778), 1,000 (1783), 400 (1796) in the United States; 414 (1885) in New York and an equal number in Canada, or a total of 828; 364 (1909) in New York, and 416 (1910) in Canada, a total of 780.

Settlements.—The following Tuscarora towns have been mentioned in writings pertaining to this people: Annaooka, Chunaneets, Coerntha, Cohunche, Conauhkaré, Contahnah, Cotechney, Coram, Corutra, Eno, Ganasaraga, Ganatisgowa, Harooka, Harutawaqui, Ingaren, Junastriyo, Jutaneaga, Kanhato, Kaunehsuntahkeh, Kenta, Kentanuska, Naurheghne, Nonawharitse; Nursoorooka, Nyuchirhaan, Ohagi, Oonossora, Oneida (in part), Oquaga, Shawhiangto, Tasqui, Tiocherungwe, Tonarooka, Torhunte, Tosneoc, Tuscarora, Unanauhan, Ucouhnerunt. Some of these towns were in North Carolina, others on Juniata r. in Pennsylvania, others on the Susquehanna in Pennsylvania, others on the Susquehanna in New York, while others were s. of Oneida lake in New York, and one in Genessee valley. The exact situation of the majority of these towns is not definitely known. In some instances the Tuscarora shared a town with other tribes, as was the case at Anajot (Oneida, or Ganowarohare) and Onohoquaga.

Treaties.—The Tuscarora have taken part in the following treaties between the United States and the Six Nations: Ft Stanwix, N. Y., Oct. 22, 1784; Ft Harmar, Ohio, Jan. 9, 1789; Canandaigua (Konondaigua), N. Y., Nov. 11, 1794; Oneida, N. Y., Dec. 2, 1794; Buffalo Creek, N. Y., Jan. 15, 1838.

Tuscarora. The name of three former villages of the Tuscarora in the 18th century: One is placed by the Brion de la Tour map of 1781 a short distance E. of "Anatsagane" (probably the present Stockbridge, Madison co., N. Y.); another was situated about 3 m. below Oquaga, Broome co., N. Y., on the w. side of the Susquehanna, approximately on the site of Windsor, and at the time it was destroyed by Col. Butler, in 1778, it contained 7 or 8 houses; the last was situated 12 m. by land and 20 by water below Oquaga, in the vicinity of Great Bend, Susquehanna co., Pa., and was destroyed by Gen. Clinton, Aug. 17, 1779. The last may possibly be identical with Ingaren, but as there were three other Tuscarora villages in this vicinity, the identification is uncertain. (J. N. B. H.)

Tushpaw. A term used by Lewis and Clark to designate the Indians "residing on a N. fork of Clark r., in the Rocky mts. in spring and summer, and on the Missouri in winter." They have not been positively identified, but the evidence (Gibbs et al.) makes it probable that they were Kutenai. According to Gatschet the term (Túshipa) is a Shoshoni designation for the tribes living to the N. of them and including the Nez Percés as well as the Kutenai. It is probable that the term as employed by Lewis and Clark included both the tribes named as well as bands of the Wallawalla and possibly other Shahaptian divisions. Lewis and Clark mention the Ootlashoot, Mick-sucksealton, and Hohilpo as Tushpaw tribes. None of these has been identified. The Tushpaw proper numbered 430, in 35 houses, in 1805. (L. F.)

Flatheads.—Lewis and Clark, Discov., 59, 1806. Tah-se-pah.—Gebow, Sho-sho-nay Vocab., 11, 1868 (Shoshoni name). Tāsh-ē-pā.—Long, Exped. Rocky Mts., II, lxxix, 1823 (sig. 'pierced noses'). Tate Platt.—Orig. Jour. Lewis and Clark, VI, 111, 1905. Tātsepa.—Gebow, op. cit. Toustchipas.—Hunt in Nouv. Ann. Tushguesta. A former village connected with San Carlos mission, Cal., and said to have been Esselen.—Taylor in Cal. Farmer, Apr. 20, 1860.

Tushkisath (Tuckis'a'th). A sept of the Toquart, a Nootka tribe.—Boas in 6th Rep. N. W. Tribes Can., 32, 1890.

Tushquegan. An Ottawa village, taking its name from the chief, who was also known as McCarty, that formerly existed on the s. bank of Maumee r., opposite Toledo, Ohio. The reservation was sold in 1833.

McCarty's village.—Maumee treaty (1819) in U. S. Ind. Treat., 205, 1873. Tushquegan.—Ibid.

Tushtun ('dragon-fly'). An Apache clan or band at San Carlos agency and Ft Apache, Ariz., in 1881.—Bourke in Jour. Am. Folk-lore, III, 112, 1890.

Tuskawillao.—Adair, Am. Inds., 353, 1775. Tuskowellow.—West Fla. map, ca. 1775.

Tuskegee (perhaps from Creek taskáya or taskánígi, 'warrior'). A former small Upper Creek town in the fork of Coosa and Tallapoosa rs., Elmore co., Ala. According to Hawkins (Sketch, 38, 39, 1848) it contained 30 buildings and 35 gunmen in 1799; they had lost their own language and spoke that of the Creeks, whose customs and manners they also had adopted. It was the residence of the noted Alexander MacGillivray, his lands lying along Coosa r. See Gatschet, Creek Migr. Leg., I, 145-6, 1884. Cf. Taskigi.

Jascag.—Jefferys, French Dom., map, 134, 1761 (wrongly on E. bank of Chattahoochee r.). Jascage.—Ibid. Jaakegis.—Roberts, Fla., 13, 1763. Jaskigis.—Alcedo, Dic. Ga., I, 367, 1811. Tooses.—Robin, Voy., I, map, 1807. Touzas.—Dumont, La., I, 135, 1753 (identical?). Tuskeegies.—Romans, Fla., I, 280, 1775. Tuskeego.—Sen. Ex. Doc. 425, 24th Cong., 1st sess., 282, 1836. Tus-ke-gee.—Hawkins (1799), Sketch, 37, 1848. Tuskegees.—Weatherford (1793) in Am. State Papers, Ind. Aff., I, 386, 1832. Tuskiki.—Gatschet, Creek Migr. Leg., I, 145, 1884 (alternative of Taskigi). Tuskogee.—Hawkins (1799), Sketch, 39, 1848. Tuskugu.—Treaty of 1827 in U. S. Ind. Treat., 420, 1837.

Tuskegee. The name of two towns of the Creek Nation, Okla.: one on Deep fork of Canadian r., w. of Ocmulgee, the other 10 m. w. of Eufaula. For the ethnology of the Creeks of Taskigi, consult Speck in Mem. Am. Anthr. Asso., II, pt. 2, 1907.

Taskigi.—Gatschet, Creek Migr. Leg., II, 186, 1888. Tuskega.—Ind. Aff. Rep., 149, 1858 ("in the Canadian dist.").

Tuskhlustunne. A former village of the Mishikhwutmetunne on Coquille r., Oreg. Tûs-qlûs' 3ûnnê'.—Dorsey in Jour. Am. Folk-lore, III, 232, 1890.

Tuskokogie. A former Iroquois village, apparently under Oneida jurisdiction, situated, according to the Brion de la Tour map, 1781, just above Schoherage, on the w. bank of the e. branch of Susquehanna r. This is probably an error for Chenango r., N. Y. (J. N. B. H.)

Tusalahockaka. A former Seminole town 10 m. w. of Walacooche, Fla. Alac Hajo was its chief in 1823.—H. R. Ex. Doc. 74 (1823), 19th Cong., 1st sess., 27, 1826.

Tuslatunne. A former Chastacosta village on the n. bank of upper Rogue r., Oreg.

Tus-la 3ûnnê'.—Dorsey in Jour. Am. Folk-lore, III, 234, 1890.

Tusolivi. A tribe or subtribe living in 1709 on Colorado r., Texas, in a rancharia with Simaomo and Yojuan. This rancharia was visited in the year named by Fr. San Buenaventura y Olivares and Fr. Espinosa, of the Rio Grande missions, who estimated the population of the settlement at 2,500. The presence of the Yojuan in the rancharia would indicate Tonkawan affiliation (Diary of San Buenaventura y Olivares, 1709, MS. in College of Santa Cruz de Querétaro). See Simaomo, and cf. Tusonid. (H. E. B.)

Tusonid. One of the tribes represented at San Juan Bautista mission, on the Rio Grande, Texas, in 1772 (MS. in College of Santa Cruz de Querétaro, K, leg. 15, doc. 10). Cf. Tusolivi.

Tusonimon. A former Sobaipuri rancharia about 4 leagues w. of Casa Grande, near the Rio Gila, s. Arizona, visited by Father Kino about 1697.

Sta Isabel.—Bernal (1697) in Bancroft, Ariz. and N. Mex., 356, 1889. Tusonimó.—Ibid. Tusonimon.—Mange (1697) in Schoolcraft, Indian Tribes, III, 303, 1853; Bernal (1697) in Bancroft, Ariz. and N. Mex., 356, 1889. Tussoninio.—Orozco y Berra, Geog., 348, 1864.

Tusquittah (Da'skwitûn'yi 'rafters place,' from daskwitûn'i 'rafters,' yi, the locative). A former Cherokee settlement on Tusquittee cr., near Hayesville, Clay co., N. C. The creek was named after the settlement. (J. M.)

Da'skwitûn'yi.—Mooney in 19th Rep. B. A. E., 514, 1900 (native name). Tusquittah.—Present map form. Tusquittee.—Doc. of 1799 quoted by Royce in 5th Rep. B. A. E., 144, 1887.

Tussawehe ('white knives'). Probably a Shoshoni tribe, although their country, in the mountains along Humboldt r. and Goose cr., n. Nevada, adjoined that of the Paiute. The name White Knives was sometimes applied to the tribe because of the beautiful flint found in their territory from which they made knives. (H. W. H.)

Goose Creek Diggers.—Stuart, Mont., 81, 1865. To'-sa wee.—Ibid. Tosawitches.—Davies in Ind. Aff. Rep., 129, 1861. To-si-witches.—Simpson (1859), Rep. of Expl. Across Utah, 34, 1876. To-si- witches.—Ibid., 510. To-se-see.—Taylor in Cal. Farmer, June 26, 1863. To-se-watan.—Powell in H. R. Misc. Doc. 86, 43d Cong., 1st sess., 1, 1874. Tesowea.—Dole in Ind. Aff. Rep. 1864, 14, 1865. To-sow-witches.—Hurt, ibid., 1856, 228, 1857. Tussé-wehe.—Gatschet in Geog. Surv. W. 100th Mer., VII, 410, 1879. White Knives.—Holeman in Ind. Aff. Rep., 152, 1852.

Tustatunkhuushi. A band of the Mishikhwutinetunne formerly residing on Coquille r., Oreg.

Tûs'-ta-tûn qu'-u-cl'.—Dorsey in Jour. Am. Folk-lore, III, 232, 1890.

Tustur. An unidentified tribe allied with the Iroquois and the tribes of the Ohio valley, possibly the Miami.

Tustans.—Stone, Life of Brant, I, 295, 1864. Tustura.—Lord Dorchester (1791) quoted by Lincoln in Mass. Hist. Soc. Coll., 3d s., v, 159, 1836.

Tutachro. A Chumashan village formerly near Purísima mission, Santa Barbara co., Cal.—Taylor in Cal. Farmer, Oct. 18, 1861.

Tutago. A Kaiyukhotana village on Yukon r. at the mouth of Auto r., Alaska; pop. 32 in 1848.

Tehouchago.—Zagoskin in Nouv. Ann. Voy., 5th s., XXI, map, 1850. Ttutaho.—Tikhmenief (1861) quoted by Baker, Geog. Dict. Alaska, 82, 1901. Tuttago.—Zagoskin, Descr. Russ. Poss. Am., map, 1848. Yakutakalitik.—Raymond in Sen. Ex. Doc. 12, 42d Cong., 1st sess., 26, 1871. Yakutakalitik.—Whymper, Alaska, 264, 1869.

Tutahaco. A name of somewhat indefinite application. It is recorded by Castañeda (14th Rep. B. A. E., 492, 519, 525, 544, 1896) as that of a province of 8 Pueblo villages, apparently on the Rio Grande in New Mexico, 4 leagues s. e. of Tiguex, visited by members of Coronado's expedition in 1540-41. The place last mentioned was undoubtedly in the vicinity of the present Bernalillo, consequently the Tigua villages about the present Isleta are generally regarded as having formed Tutahaco province; on the other hand, if the distance (4 leagues) is an error, the former Piro and Tigua villages e. of the Rio Grande, in the Salinas, may have been meant, otherwise they were the only pueblos in New Mexico or Arizona that were not visited by members of Coronado's force. Jaramillo (14th Rep. op. cit., 545) confounded Tutahaco with Acoma, possibly on account of the resemblance of the last syllable to the Acoma name of their pueblo (Ako). The Tigua (Isleta) name of Acoma is Tuthlauay; and of the Pueblo people who formerly lived s. of them (evidently the Piro), Tukahun. See Bandelier in Arch. Inst. Papers, IV, 234 et seq., 1892. (F. W. H.)

Tutahaco.—Domenech, Deserts, I, 88, 1853 (misprint). Tutahaco.—Castañeda and Jaramillo in 14th Rep. B. A. E., op. cit. Tutahaco.—Davis, Span. Conq. N. Mex., 189, 1869 (misprint). Tutaliaco.—Castañeda (1596) in Ternaux-Compans, Voy., IX, 57, 1838 (evidently identical, although used for Acoma). Tutahaco.—Gallatin in Nouv. Ann. Voy., 5th s., XXVII, 264, 1851 (misprint). Tutuhaco.—Castañeda (1596) in Ternaux-Compans, Voy., IX, 139, 1838.

Tutalosi (Creek: tutalósi, 'chicken,' 'fowl'). A former Hitchiti town on Tu-talosi cr., a branch of Kinchafoonee cr., probably in Lee or Terrell co., Ga. In later years its people moved w. of Chatahoochee r. and were known thereafter as Hitchiti.

Fowl Town.—Of several authors. Tatayshukli.—Gatschet, Creek Migr. Leg., I, 149, 1884 (Hitchiti name of its people). Tuttallasee.—Hawkins (1814) in Am. State Papers, Ind. Aff., I, 845, 1832. Tut-tal-lee-see.—Ibid., 859. Tut-tal-lo-see.—Hawkins (1779), Sketch, 65, 1848.

Tutchonekutchin ('crow people'). A Kutchin tribe on Yukon r. from Deer r. to Ft Selkirk, Yukon Ter., Canada. They number about 1,100 and differ but little from their Kutchin neighbors below.

Caribou Indians.—Dall in Cont. N. A. Ethnol., I, 32, 1877 (so called by Hudson's Bay Co. people). Caribou Indians.—Ross, MS. notes on Tinne, B. A. E. Crow People.—Dall in *Cont. N. A. Tutelary. See Oyaron, Totem.

Tutelo. One of the eastern Siouan tribes, formerly living in Virginia and North Carolina, but now extinct. Hale (Proc. Am. Philos. Soc., Mar. 2, 1883) first made it known that the Tutelo language pertained to the Siouan stock, a discovery which, followed by the investigations of Gatschet, Mooney, and J. O. Dorsey, brought to light the fact that a considerable group of Siouan tribes formerly inhabited the piedmont region of Virginia and the Carolinas. The relation of the Tutelo appears to have been most intimate with the Saponi, the language of the two tribes being substantially the same. Their intimate association with the Occaneechi and their allied tribes indicates ethnic relationship. The history of the Tutelo is virtually the same as that of the Saponi. The name Tutelo, although by the English commonly used to designate a particular tribe, was by the Iroquois applied as a generic term for all the Siouan tribes of Virginia and Carolina, being applied more particularly to the allied tribes gathered at Ft Christanna (see Christanna Indians). They are first mentioned by Capt. John Smith in 1609 under the names of Monacan and Mannahoac, with many subtribes, occupying the upper waters of James and Rappahannock rs., Va., and described by him as very barbarous, subsisting chiefly on the products of the chase and wild fruits. They were at constant war with the Powhatan Indians and in mortal dread of the Iroquois. Lederer, in his exploration from Virginia into North Carolina in 1670, passed through their territory and mentions the names of Nahyssan (Monahassanough) and Sapon (Saponi). In their frontier position at the base of the mountains the Saponi and Tutelo were directly in the path of the Iroquois.

Unable to withstand the constant attacks of these northern enemies, they abandoned this location some time between 1671 and 1701, and removed to the junction of Staunton and Dan rs., where they established themselves near their friends and kinsmen, the Occaneechi, occupying two of the islands in the Roanoke immediately below the forks, the Tutelo settling on the upper one. How long they remained here is unknown; it is certain, however, that in 1701 Lawson found the Saponi on Yadkin r., N. C., and says that the Tutelo were living in the neighboring mountains toward the w., probably about the headwaters of the Yadkin. At this time, according to Lawson, the 5 Siouan tribes, the Tutelo, Saponi, Keyauwee, Occaneechi, and Shakori, numbered together only about 750 souls. Soon after Lawson's visit they all moved in toward the white settlements, and, crossing the Roanoke, occupied a village called Sapon town, a short distance e. of the river, about 15 m. w. of the present Windsor, Bertie co., N. C. Soon after this they removed and settled near Ft Christanna (see Christanna Indians, Totero). In 1722, through the efforts of the Colonial governments, peace was finally made between the Iroquois and the Virginia tribes. In consequence the Saponi and Tutelo some years later moved to the N. and settled on the Susquehanna at Shamokin (q. v.), Pa., under Iroquois protection, later moving up the river to Skogari. Their chiefs were allowed to sit in the great council of the Six Nations. In 1763 the two tribes, together with the Nanticoke and Conoy, numbered, according to Sir Wm. Johnson, 200 men, possibly 1,000 souls. In 1771 the Tutelo were settled on the e. side of Cayuga inlet, about 3 m. from the s. end of the lake, in a town called Coreorgonel, which was destroyed in 1779 by Gen. Sullivan. The last surviving full-blood Tutelo known was Nikonha, from whom Hale obtained the linguistic material by which he determined the relation of the tribe to the Siouan stock. He died in 1871. It is believed there are still a few mixed-bloods in Canada, but the last one who could speak the language was John Key, or Gostango ('Below the Rock'), whose Tutelo name was Nastabon ('One Step'), and who died in 1898, aged about 80 years (Chadwick, People of the Longhouse, 19, 1897; Boyle in Ann. Archæol. Rep. Ontario, 55, pl. xviii, b, 1898). Lawson describes the Tutelo as "tall, likely men, having great plenty of buffaloes, elks, and bears, with every sort of deer amongst them, which strong food makes large, robust bodies." Nevertheless the evidence is clear that they were cultivators of the soil and relied thereon to a large extent for subsistence. The photograph of Nikonha, given by Hale, shows a face full oval in outline and large features of an almost European cast, "evidently," says Hale, "not individual or family traits, as they reappear in the Tutelo half-breeds on the Reserve, who do not claim a near relationship to Nikonha." On the other hand Zeisberger, who visited the remnant of the tribe while settled at Shamokin, speaks of the village as "the only town on the continent inhabited by Tuteloes, a degenerate remnant of thieves and drunkards." Lederer describes the Nahyssan chief as an absolute monarch, and the people as tall, warlike, and rich. In their temples, or medicine lodges, they had large quantities of pearls, which they had taken in war from more southern tribes. Their tribal ensign consisted of three arrows.

S. Matias Tutum.—Mange in Bancroft, Ariz. and N. Mex., 357, 1889.

Tututni. An Athapascan tribe or group of small tribes formerly occupying villages along lower Rogue r., Oreg., and on the considered as one tribe, as villages warred one upon another without violation of national unity or tribal sentiment (Dorsey in Jour. Am. Folk-lore, III, 232, 1890). The Tututni were removed to Siletz res. as prisoners of war in 1856. They formerly practised polygyny, widows being buried alive in the graves of their deceased husbands (Everette, Tutu MS. vocab., B. A. E., 1883). In 1854 (Ind. Aff. Rep. 1854, 495, 1855) the total population was 1,311, consisting of 448 men, 490 women, 205 boys, and 168 girls. According to Parrish (op. cit.) the bands were: Nasohnah (Nasumi, a Kusan village), Chocrelatan (Chocrelatan), Quahtomah (Kwatami), Cosuttheutun (Kwusathlkhuntunne), Enquachee (Yukichetunne), Yahshute (Chemetunne), Chetlesentun (Chetlesiyetunne), Wishtenatin (Khwaishtunnetunne), Cheatte (Chetco), Tototin (Tututunne), Mackanotin (Mikonotunne), and Shistakoostee (Chastacosta). Dorsey (op. cit., 233) gave the following list of former bands or villages on the coast s. of Rogue r.: Chemetunne, Kaltserghetunne, Kosotshe, Kwatami, Kthukhwutunne, Kwusathlkhuntunne, Natutshlunne, Niletunne, and Yukichetunne. The following were on both banks: Chetlesiyetunne, Etatthatunne, Kunechuta, Kushetunne, Mikonotunne, Targheliichetunne, Targhutthotunne, Testthitun, Thethlkhuttunne, and Thechuntunne. On or near the coast s. of Rogue r. were the following: Aanetun, Chetleschantunne, Enitunne, Khainanaitetunne, Kheerghia, Khwaishtunnetunne, Nakatkaitunne, Natthutunne, Nuchumatunne, Sentethitun, Skumeme, Tsetintunne, and Tsetuttunne. Kthutetnetseetuttun was on the coast just n. of Rogue r. (J. O. D.)

Tutuwalha ('the guardians,' in allusion to three high columns of sandstone near by). Two former pueblos of the Hopi of Arizona, one of which was situated on the Middle mesa, the other being the Squash village on the terrace below.—Stephen in 8th Rep. B. A. E., 26, 1891.

Tutzone ('plenty of water'). An Apache band or clan at San Carlos agency and Ft Apache, Ariz., in 1881 (Bourke in Jour. Am. Folk-lore, iii, 112, 1890), corresponding to the Tutzose of the Pinal Coyoteros and the Thotsoni of the Navaho.

Tutzose.—Bourke, op. cit.

Tutzose. A band or clan of the Pinal Coyoteros.—Bourke in Jour. Am. Folk-lore, iii, 112, 1890. Cf. Tutzone.

Tuvachi. One of the Bird clans of the Kokop (Wood) phratry of the Hopi.

Tüvatei wiñwū.—Fewkes in 19th Rep. B. A. E., 584, 1900 (wiñwū = 'clan'). Tü-vü-toi wūñ-wū.—Fewkes in Am. Anthr., vii, 404, 1894.

Tuvak. A Tahagmiut Eskimo village on the N. coast of Labrador, lon. 70°.—Hind, Lab. Penin., ii, map, 1863.

Tuvou. The Piñon clan of the Hopi; apparently the same as the Tovu (Fire) clan (q. v.).

Tuvou wiñwū.—Fewkes in 19th Rep. B. A. E., 584, 1900 (wiñwū = 'clan'). Tü-vo'-ü wūñ-wū.—Fewkes in Am. Anthr., vii, 404, 1894.

Tuwa. The Sand phratry of the Hopi, which comprises the Kukuch, Bachipkwasi, Nananawi, Momobi (varieties of the Lizard), Pisa (White Sand), Tuwa (Red Sand), Chukai (Mud), Sihü (Flower or Bush), and Nanahu (Small Striped Squirrel) clans. They claim to have come from a region in s. Arizona called Palatkwabi, and from Little Colorado r. The Earth or Sand phratry of Fewkes is identical with the Lizard phratry of Stephen.

Tü-wa' nyū-mū.—Fewkes in Am. Anthr., vii, 404, 1894 (nyū-mū = 'phratry').

Tuwa. The Sand clan of the Hopi.

Tdu'-wa.—Stephen in 8th Rep. B. A. E., 39, 1891 (= 'Red Sand'). Tüwá.—Voth, Oraibi Summer Snake Ceremony, 284, 1903. Tüwa wiñwū.—Fewkes in 19th Rep. B. A. E., 583, 1900 (wiñwū = 'clan'). Tü-wa wūñ-wū.—Fewkes in Am. Anthr., vii, 404, 1894.

Tuwahokasha (Tu-uxa-hok'-a-sha, from tuh 'village', uxa the characteristic roach on the head of a man who has been shaved on both sides, hok'-a-sha 'curving over': 'village on a ridge'). A band of the Skidi Pawnee.—Grinnell, Pawnee Hero Stories, 238, 1889.

Tuwa-Kukuch ('Sand [and] Lizard'). A phratral group of the Hopi of Arizona, consisting of the Sand, Lizard, and Flower or Bush clans. They claim that their ancestors came from a region in s. Arizona called Palatkwabi, and from Little Colorado r. (J. W. F.)

Tüwa-Küküto.—Fewkes in 19th Rep. B. A. E., 583, 1900.

Tuwanek (Tüwānekq). A Seechelt sept which formerly lived at the head of Narrow's Arm, Seechelt inlet, Brit. Col.—Hill-Tout in Jour. Anthr. Inst., 25, 1904.

Tuwarints (Tu-wur-ints). One of the tribes known under the collective term Gosiute, formerly living on Snake cr., s. w. Utah.—Powell and Ingalls in Ind. Aff. Rep. 1873, 51, 1874.

Tuxedo. A dinner jacket, so called from Tuxedo, the name of a summer resort in Passaic co., N. J., on the lake of the same name. The word is derived from the Delaware dialect of Algonquian, in which the Wolf subtribe was called P'tuksit, spelled by Morgan Took-seat. This name is a socio-esoteric term for wolf and signifies literally, 'he has a round foot,' from p'tuksiteu (eu = o). (A. F. C.)

Tuxican. An old Tlingit town belonging to the Henya, situated on a narrow strait on the N. w. coast of Prince of Wales id., Alaska. Formerly it was the chief Henya town, but the Henya have now moved to Klawak.

Ták-sai-kān.—Krause, Tlinkit Ind., 120, 1885 (given as the name of a family). Tə'qđjīk-ān.—Swanton, field notes, B. A. E., 1904.

Tuyunga. A former Gabrieleño village in Encino or San Fernando valley, Los Angeles co., Cal.—Padre Santa María (1796) quoted by Bancroft, Hist. Cal., i, 553, 1886.

Tuzahe. Mentioned as a pueblo of the province of Atripuy (q. v.), in the region of the lower Rio Grande, N. Mex., in 1598.—Oñate (1598) in Doc. Inéd., xvi, 115, 1871.

Tuziyammos. A Paviotso tribe formerly about Warner lake, s. Oreg. Hótcu, or Ochoho as he was commonly known, was its chief, and by the latter name the tribe was usually called. They were moved to the Yainax agency, Oreg., but subsequently left it and ranged to the s., especially about Camp Bidwell, n. e. Cal., where the remnants of the tribe are now supposed to be. (H. W. H.)

Ocheo's band.—Dyar in Ind. Aff. Rep. 1873, 324, 1874.
Tu-zí' yam-mos.—Powell, Paviotso MS., B. A. E., 1881.

Tuzzint. A village, presumably Costanoan, formerly connected with Dolores mission, San Francisco, Cal.—Taylor in Cal. Farmer, Oct. 18, 1861.

Twana. A Salish division living along both sides of Hoods canal, w. Wash. The name is said to signify 'a portage,' the portage referred to being that between the head of Hoods canal and the headwaters of Puget sd. According to Eells there are three bands—the Colcine, Skokomish, and Tulalip. From the name of one of these bands all of them are sometimes called Skokomish. Pop. about 265 in 1853. They are probably the Skokomish of the Indian Office reports, numbering 203 in 1909.

Tweeg. A large North American batrachian (Menopoma alleghanensis), called also hell-bender, mud-devil, ground-puppy, spring-keeper, man-eater, etc. The name is from Lenape (Delaware) twe'ku', a radical word. (W. R. G.)

Tweezers. See Pincers.

Twenty-nine Palms. A reservation of 160.21 acres of patented desert land, near the 116th meridian, in the Mohave desert, Cal., nearly half way between Indio on the Southern Pac. R. R. and Bagdad on the Santa Fé Pac. R. R. The settlement formerly belonged to the Serranos, but in 1867 the Chemehuevi, after fighting the Mohave, by whom they were defeated, fled to this place; meanwhile the Serranos have died out or moved away. In 1908 the entire population, with the exception of a single Serrano, was Chemehuevi. Within the last few years several Chemehuevi removed from Twenty-nine Palms, on account of lack of subsistence, to the Cabezon res. of the Cahuillas (Kawia), near Coachella, 3 m. s. e. of Indio. (See Kroeber in Univ. Cal. Pub., Am. Arch. and Eth., viii, 33, 37, 1908.)

Mara.—Kroeber in Univ. Cal. Pub., Am. Arch. and Eth., viii, 33, 1908 (native name). Twenty-mile Palms.—Ind. Aff. Rep. 1902, 175, 1903.

Two Runs. A former Cherokee village on Etowah r., at the crossing of the old Indian trail between Coosa and Tugaloo rs., in the present Bartow co., n. w. Ga.—Royce in 5th Rep. B. A. E., map, 1887.

Twostars, Solomon. An hereditary chief of the Sisseton Sioux; born at Lacqui-parle, Minn., in 1827. He early became a convert to Christianity under the ministry of Riggs and Williamson, and was a federal scout in the Sioux outbreak of 1862. He was still living at Sisseton agency, S. Dak., in 1907. (D. R.)

Tyacappan. A village formerly in the vicinity of Trinity r., Texas, visited by La Salle in 1687 while on the way from Ft St Louis on Matagorda bay to the Mississippi. Douay says that the village was large and that its people possessed horses. La Salle relates that the houses were of interlaced canes, covered with fine white plaster. Here was found a boy who could speak Spanish. The village was in the Caddoan country, and the people may have belonged to that family. (A. C. F.)

Ticapanas.—Cavelier (1687) quoted by Shea, Early Voy., 37, 1861. Tyakappa.—Coxe, Carolina, map, 1741. Tyakappan.—Douay (1687) in Shea, Discov. Miss. Val., 212, 1852. Tycappans.—Coxe (1741) in French, Hist. Coll. La., II, 241, 1850.

Tyais. The extinct Piñon clan of Sia pueblo, N. Mex.

Tyais-háno.—Hodge in Am. Anthr., IX, 351, 1896 (hano='people').

Tyajuindena (Tya-juin-den-a). A former pueblo of the Jemez (q. v.) in New Mexico, the exact site of which is not known.—Bandelier in Arch. Inst. Papers, IV, 207, 1892.

Tyasoliwa. A former pueblo of the Jemez of New Mexico; definite location undetermined. (F. W. H.)

Tyee. 1. A man of importance; a chief; somebody. 2. Important; superior; great. The word is used in parts of the Pacific coast: from tyee 'chief,' in the Chinook jargon, a term ultimately derived from the Nootka dialect of the Wakashan family. (A. F. C.)

Tyendinaga (probably named in honor of Thayendanegea, q. v.). A Mohawk reservation of about 17,000 acres of tillable land, occupied in 1910 by 1,323 Indians, on Quinté bay near the e. end of L. Ontario, in Hastings co., Ontario. The Indians are known officially as "Mohawks of the Bay of Quinté."—Can. Ind. Aff. Reps.

Tyigh. A Shahaptian tribespeaking the Tenino language and formerly occupying the country about Tygh and White rs. in Wasco co., Oreg. They took part in the Wasco treaty of 1855 and are now on Warm Springs res., Oreg. Their number is not reported, as they are classed under the indiscriminate term "Warm Springs Indians," but in 1854 they were said to number 500, and in 1859, 450. (L. F.)

Attayas.—De Smet, Letters, 220, 1843 (probably identical). Iyich.—Taylor in Cal. Farmer, June 12, 1863. Tai'-áq.—Mooney in 14th Rep. B. A. E., 742, 1896. Taighs.—Shea, Lib. Am. Tyonek ('little chief'). A trading station and Knaikhotana settlement on the w. side of Cook inlet, Alaska. The station in 1881 consisted of 2 whites, 6 creoles, and 109 natives (Petroff, Rep. on Alaska, 29, 1884). In 1890 (11th Census, Alaska, 169, 1893) there were 115 inhabitants and 21 houses. The total number of natives in the district is 150 to 200. Besides hunting and trapping they catch king salmon to sell to the canneries. All are members of the Russian church. Formerly they acted as middlemen in the trade with the Knaikhotana on Sushitna r., who now come down to the station with their furs.

Tyonek.—Baker, Geog. Dict. Alaska, 416, 1902. Tyonok.—Petroff in 10th Census, Alaska, map, 1884. Tu-i-u'-nūk.—Hoffman, MS., B. A. E. (said to be Kaniagmiut name; trans. 'marsh people'). Tyoonok.—Post-route map, 1903.

Tyuga. An unidentifiable Pomo division or village, said to have been near the Makoma, in Sonoma co., Cal., in 1858.—Bancroft, Nat. Races, I, 451, 1874.

Tyuonyi (Keres: 'treaty', 'compact'). A gorge about 20 m. w. of Santa Fé, N. Mex., otherwise known as the Rito de los Frijoles, in which are the remains of numerous cave dwellings and extensive pueblo ruins, the former habitations probably of Keresan tribes. See Bandelier cited below; Hewett in Am. Anthr., VI, 638, 1904; IX, nos. 3, 4, 1909.

Rito de los Frijoles.—Powell in 4th Rep. B. A. E., xxxvi, 1886 (Spanish name). Tyuonyi.—Bandelier, Delight Makers, 3, et seq., 1890. Tyuo-nyi.—Bandelier in Arch. Inst. Papers, IV, 145, 1892. Yu-ñu-ye.—Powell, op. cit., 1886 (given as Cochiti name).

Tyupi. The Badger clans of the pueblos of Laguna and Sia, N. Mex. That of the former claims to have come originally from Zuñi.

Ohópi-háno^{ch}.—Hodge in Am. Anthr., IX, 349, 1896 (Laguna form; háno^{ch} = 'people'). Tzúpi-háno.—Ibid. (Sia form).

Tzaedelkay ('white sand'). An Apache band or clan at San Carlos agency and Ft Apache, Ariz., in 1881.

Tza-é-delkay.—Bourke in Jour. Am. Folk-lore, III, 112, 1890.

Tzahavak. A Chingigmiut Eskimo village near C. Newenham, Alaska; pop. 48 in 1880.

Tzaharagamut.—Post-route map, 1903. Tzahavagamut.—Nelson in 18th Rep. B. A. E., map, 1899. Tzahavagamute.—Petroff, Rep. on Alaska, 53, 1881.

Tzauamuk (refers to the noise of rolling stones in the bed of a stream). A Ntlakyapamuk village 6 or 7 m. above Boston Bar, Frazer r., Brit. Col.; pop. 5 in 1897, when last separately enumerated. Ohomok.—Can. Ind. Aff., 230, 1884. Ohomok-Spayam.—Ibid., 418, 1898 (names of two towns combined). Tay-ab-Muck.—Can. Ind. Aff., 79, 1878. Tsa'umák.—Teit in Mem. Am. Mus. Nat. Hist., II, 169, 1900. Tzau'amuk.—Hill-Tout in Rep. Ethnol. Surv. Can., 5, 1899.

Tzebinaste ('round rock'). An Apache band or clan at San Carlos agency and Ft Apache, Ariz., in 1881.

Tze-binaste.—Bourke in Jour. Am. Folk-lore, III, 112, 1890.

Tzecheschinne ('black rock'). An Apache band or clan at San Carlos agency and Ft Apache, Ariz., in 1881; apparently corresponding to the Tsinazhini, or perhaps the Tsezhinthiai or the Tsethe-shkizhni of the Navaho.

Chez-ye-na.—White, Apache Names of Ind. Tribes, MS., B. A. E. ('black rocks'). Tze-ches-chinne.—Bourke in Jour. Am. Folk-lore, III, 112, 1890. Tzój-in-né.—ten Kate, Synonymie, 5, 1884.

Tzekinne ('people of the rocks'). A mixed people, partly Apache and partly Piman, descendants of the cliff-dwelling Sobaipuri, whom the Apache drove out of Aravaipa canyon, s. e. Ariz., and forced to flee to the Pima at the beginning of the 19th century. A few descendants are said to dwell among the White Mountain Apache.

Taix'-xa^{n'}-ä.—Gatschet, Apache MS., B. A. E., 1883 ('living on the mountain top'). Tze-kinne.—Bourke in Jour. Am. Folk-lore, III, 114, 1890 (—'stone house people').

Tzekupama. A band formerly inhabiting the lower Colorado valley, in the present Arizona or California, and who were conquered, absorbed, or driven out by the Mohave.—Bourke in Jour. Am. Folk-lore, II, 185, 1889.

Tzemantuo. A prehistoric ruined pueblo of the compact, communal type, situated about 5 m. s. of Galisteo, Santa Fé co., N. Mex. The Tano now living at Santo Domingo claim that it was a village of their ancestors.

Pueblo Colorado.—Bandelier in Ritch, New Mex., 201, 1885. Tze-man Tu-o.—Bandelier in Arch. Inst. Papers, IV, 106, 1892.

Tzenatay. A former Tano pueblo opposite the little settlement of La Bajada, on the declivity sloping from the w. toward the bed of Santa Fé cr., 6 m. e. of the Rio Grande and 20 m. s. w. of Santa Fé, N. Mex. The village was constructed of volcanic rock and rubble, and probably sheltered 500 people. It had evidently been destroyed by fire, and, with a number of other pueblos in this region that appear to have met a similar fate, is commonly known by the Spanish name Pueblo Quemado, 'burnt village.' According to Bandelier (Arch. Inst. Papers, iv, 95 et seq., 1892) it is not known whether this village was abandoned prior to the 16th century; it may have been the Pueblo Quemado mentioned by Oñate in 1598, but as the remains of a prehistoric Tano or Tewa village 6 m. s. w. of Santa Fé were known by the same name, possibly the latter was the village referred to.

El Pueblo Quemado.—Bandelier, op. cit., 96. Popolo Bruciato.—Columbus Mem. Vol., 155, 1893 (Italian form). Pueblo quemado.—Oñate (1598) in Doc. Inéd., xvi, 114, 1871 (possibly identical).

Tzetseskadn ('top-of-hill people'). An Apache band or clan at San Carlos agency and Ft Apache, Ariz., in 1881 (Bourke in Jour. Am. Folk-lore, iii, 112, 1890); corresponding to the Bithani of the Navaho. Sid-is-kine.—White, Apache Names of Ind. Tribes, MS., B. A. E. (trans. 'red dirt' or 'red rocks'). Tze-tzes-kadn.—Bourke, op. cit.

Tziltadin ('mountain slope'). A band or clan of the Pinal Coyoteros at San Carlos agency, Ariz., in 1881 (Bourke in Jour. Am. Folk-lore, iii, 114, 1890). It corresponds to the Tsiltaden (q. v.) of the Chiricahua Apache.

Tzintzilchutzikadn ('acorn'). An Apache band or clan at San Carlos agency and Ft Apache, Ariz., in 1881.—Bourke in Jour. Am. Folk-lore, iii, 111, 1890.

Tziseketzillan ('twin peaks'). An Apache band or clan at San Carlos agency and Ft Apache, Ariz., in 1881.

Tzis-eque-tzillan.—Bourke in Jour. Am. Folk-lore, iii, 112, 1890.

Tzlanapah ('plenty of water'). An Apache band or clan at San Carlos and Ft Apache agency, Ariz., in 1881. According to Bourke (Jour. Am. Folk-lore, iii, 111, 1890) the name is one of the arbitrary variants of "Tusayan," the native name adopted by the Spaniards for the Hopi country, and still used; but Bourke is probably in error.

Clin'-ar-par.—White, Apache Names of Ind. Tribes, MS., B. A. E. Sla-na-pa.—Bourke in Jour. Am. Folk-lore, iii, 126, 1890. Tu-sahn.—Ibid. Tusa-yan.—Ibid. Tu-sla.—Ibid. Tu-sla-na-pa.—Ibid. Tu-slan-go.—Ibid.

Tzolgan ('white mountain'). An Apache band or clan at San Carlos agency and Ft Apache, Ariz., in 1881.—Bourke in Jour. Am. Folk-lore, iii, 111, 1890.

Tzues. A Makah village 4 m. s. of Waatch, n. w. Washington; pop. 99 in 1863.

Tsoo-Yess.—U. S. Ind. Treat., 461, 1873. Tsuess.—Swan in Smithsonian Cont., xvi, 6, 1870. Tsū-yess.—Gibbs in Cont. N. A. Ethnol., i, 173, 1877.

Uacazil ('sandy cave'). A rancheria, probably Cochimi, under Purísima (Cadegomo) mission, s. Lower California, in the 18th century.—Doc. Hist. Mex., 4th s., v, 188, 1857.

Uahatzae (Ü-hä-tza-e). A former pueblo of the Jemez (q. v.), in New Mexico, the exact site of which is not known.—Bandelier in Arch. Inst. Papers, iv, 207, 1892.

Uainuints ('digger people'). A Paiute band formerly living about St George, s. w. Utah, numbering 80 in 1873. The significance of the name arises from the fact that this was the only Paiute band in this region which practised agriculture. The English translation of the name, "Diggers," subsequently was applied to all root-digging Indians, and, as according to the general idea this practice implied a low type of culture, the term became synonymous with all that is low and degraded. (H. W. H.)

U'-ai-Nu-ints.—Powell in Ind. Aff. Rep. 1873, 50, 1874. Urai-Nuints.—Ingalls in H. R. Ex. Doc. 66, 42d Cong., 3d sess., 2, 1873.

Ualik. A Togiagamiut Eskimo village on Kulukak bay, Alaska; pop. 68 in 1880.

Ooailik.—Post-route map, 1903. Ooallikh.—Petroff in 10th Census, Alaska, 17, 1884.

Uames. Given by Ker (Travels, 93, 1816), as the name of a tribe in the Caddo country, apparently in extreme n. w. Louisiana. Not identifiable, and probably an invented name.

Uapige (Tewa: Uap-i-ge, or Wap-i-ge). A prehistoric Tano pueblo e. of Lamy station, on the A. T. & S. F. R. R., some distance in the mountains, in n. central New Mexico.—Bandelier in Arch. Inst. Papers, iv, 100, 1892.

Ubakhea. A Pomo division, or probably a village, near the Shanel, in s. Mendocino co., Cal., and speaking the same language.—Gibbs (1851) in Schoolcraft, Ind. Tribes, iii, 112, 1853.

Uchak. A Kuskwogmiut Eskimo village on the right bank of Kuskokwim r., Alaska.

Uchagmiut.—Holmberg, Ethnol. Skizz., map, 1855.

Ugokhamiut.—11th Census, Alaska, 164, 1893.

Uchapa. Given as a Karok village on Klamath r., n. w. Cal.

Ut-cha-pah.—McKee (1851) in Sen. Ex. Doc. 4, 32d Cong., spec. sess., 194, 1853. Ut-cha-pas.—Ibid., 215 (given as a Hupa division). Ut-chap-pah.—Ibid., 161. Ut-scha-pahs.—Meyer, Nach dem Sacramento, 282, 1855.

Uchean Family. A linguistic family limited, so far as is positively known, to a single tribe, the Yuchi (q. v.).

—Uchees.—Gallatin in Trans. and Coll. Am. Antiq. Soc., ii, 95, 1836 (based on the Yuchi alone); Bancroft, Hist. U. S., iii, 247, 1840; Gallatin in Trans. Am. Ethnol. Soc., ii, pt. 1, cxix, 77, 1848; Keane in Stanford, Compend., Cent. and So. Am., app., 472, 1878 (suggests that the language may have been akin to Natchez). —Utchees.—Gallatin in Trans. and Coll. Am. Antiq. Soc., ii, 806, 1836; Gallatin in Schoolcraft, Ind. Tribes, iii, 401, 1853; Keane in Stanford, Compend., Cent. and So. Am., app., 472, 1878. —Utachies.—Berghaus (1845), Physik. Ugāgōg'-mūt.—Dall in Cont. N. A. Ethnol., I, 19, 1877.

Ugalakmiut ('far people'). A tribe of Alaskan Eskimo living on the coast at the mouth of Copper r. and on Kayak id. According to the latest writers they have been so far metamorphosed by contact with the Tlingit as to be more properly Tlingit than Eskimo. They live mainly by fishing. Between them and the Chugachigmiut the Copper River Indians have intruded (Dall, Alaska, 401, 1870). They have been classed by some as Tlingit, by others as Athapaskan, confusion having arisen from Indian vocabularies taken from visitors in the Ugalakmiut villages. A distinction was made between the Ugalakmiut, who were regarded as a small division of the Chingachimiut, and a supposed Indian tribe, by some considered Tlingit, by some as Athapaskan, called Ugalentsi. When it was found that the natives of Kayak and the opposite mainland have an Innuut vocabulary, they were classed as a separate Eskimo tribe, to which the name Ugalentsi was transferred, which is merely their own name with a Russian termination (Dall in Cont. N. A. Ethnol., I, 21, 1877). Their principal village is Eyak.

Guth-le-uk-qwan.—Emmons in Mem. Am. Mus. Nat. Hist., III, 231, 1903 (Tlingit name of natives from C. Uinkarets (U-in-ka'-rets, 'where the pine grows'). A Paiute band in the mountains of the same name, n. Arizona.—Powell in Ind. Aff. Rep. 1873, 50, 1874.

Uinta (contr. of Uintats). A division of Ute formerly living in n. e. Utah, of which the so-called Elk Mountain Ute were probably a subdivision. Powell found 194 on the Uinta res. in 1873. The name was subsequently applied to the reservation in n. e. Utah and to various bands assembled there, which thus included the Cumumbah, Kosunats, Pikakwanarats, Pahvants, Sanpet, Seuvarits, Timpaiavats, and Yampa, as well as the original Uinta. The name Uinta is still applied to some of these bands, while the remainder, including the Yampa and some others, are called White River Utes. The Indians now officially regarded as Uinta numbered 443 in 1909, under the Uintah and Ouray school superintendent, Utah. (H. W. H.)

Ewinte.—Wilson in Ind. Aff. Rep. 1849, 67, 1850. Pag-wa-nu-chi.—Hrdlicka, inf'n, 1907 (given as one of their own names, sig. E., map, 1899. Yukagamut.—Post route map, 1903. Yukagamute.—Raymond in Sen. Ex. Doc 12 42d Cong., 1st sess., 25, 1871.

Ukakhpakhti (etymologically the same as the tribal name, and Capaha and Pacaha, village names given by De Soto's chroniclers). One of the 5 Quapaw villages known to the French in the 17th and early part of the 18th centuries. The village visited by Marquette in 1683 was probably in Phillips co., Ark., lower on the Mississippi than the one seen by De Soto in 1541. When Gravier arrived, 27 years later, he found the people still lower down. Of the village at which Marquette stopped nothing was left save the old "outworks," doubtless mounds, walls etc. La Harpe (1722) said that the people of this village were originally from the Kansa nation, evidently an echo of the tradition relating to the former unity of the "Dhegiha" group. Pénicaut (1700) speaks of the "Arkansas nation," living on Arkansas r., as distinct from "the Torimas and the Kappas," who lived with them. Jefferys (1761) located them above the "Sothouis" (Uzutiuhi). Poisson (1727) gives the relative position of the four villages as follows: "Entering the Arkansas by the lower branch, from the mouth of this branch to where the river separates into two streams it is 7 leagues, and from thence to the first village, which contains two nations, the Tourimas and the Tougingas; from this first village to the second there are 2 leagues by water and 1 league by land; the latter they call the village of the Sauthouis; the third village is a little higher up, on the bank of the same river; this is the village of the Kappas." Shea supposed that this band existed no longer except in name, but J. O. Dorsey in 1883 found some of the Quapaw who claimed to belong to it.

Cappa.—Joutel (1687) in French, Hist. Coll. La., i, 176, 1846. Uqa'qpa-qtli.—Dorsey in 15th Rep. B. A. E., 229, 1897.

Ulu. The woman's knife of the Eskimo. The modern kitchen chopping knife and the saddler's knife are derived from ancient similar tools plied by women. The Eskimo knives were made in great variety, ranging from a chipped stone wrapped with a splint on one edge for a grip, to knives having exquisite carved handles of ivory, shaped to the hand and furnished with steel blades. As the women were the only workers on skins of animals, these were their peculiar tools, for which they found a great number of uses in skinning the game, preparing skins, and cutting out garments of many parts. See Mason in Rep. U. S. Nat. Mus. 1890, 411-16, 1891.

Ulukakhotana. A division of Kaiyuhkhotana living on Unalaklik r., Alaska; pop. 25 in 1890. The natives have been expelled by Eskimo intruders and have settled on Yukon r. The chief village is Iktigalik.

Umanaktuak. A winter settlement of Talirpia Okomiut Eskimo on an island near the s. w. coast of Cumberland ad., not far from the entrance.

Annanaetook.—Kumlien in Bull. 15, U. S. Nat. Mus., 15, 1879. Umanaq-tuq.—Boas in 6th Rep. B. A. E., 426, 1883. Umanactuac.—Boas in Petermanns Mitteil., xvii, no. 80, p. 70, 1885.

Umatilla. A Shahaptian tribe formerly living on Umatilla r. and the adjacent banks of the Columbia in Oregon. They were included under the Wallawalla by Lewis and Clark in 1805, though their language is distinct. In 1855 they joined in a treaty with the United States and settled on Umatilla res. in s. Oregon. They are said to number 250, but this figure is doubtful, owing to the mixture of tribes on the reservation (L. F.)

Umpqua. An Athapaskan tribe formerly settled on upper Umpqua r., Oreg., s. of the Kuitsh. Hale (Ethnol. and Philol., 204, 1846) said they were supposed to number not more than 400, having been greatly reduced by disease. They lived in houses of boards and mats, and derived their sustenance mainly from the river. In 1902 there were 84 on Grande Ronde res., Oregon. Their chief village was Hewut. A part of them, the Nahankhuotana, lived along Cow cr. All the Athapaskan tribes of s. Oregon were once considered divisions of the Umpqua. Parker (Jour., 262, 1842) named as divisions the unidentified Palakahu, the uncertain Skoton and Chasta, and the Chilula and Kwatami.

Unaduti ('und'dut, 'woolly, or bushy, head,' from und'déna, 'woolly,' dut, referring to the head). A distinguished mixed-blood Cherokee chief, commonly known to the whites as Dennis W. Bushy-head; born Mar. 18, 1826, at a small Cherokee settlement then on Mouse cr., about

UMATILLA WOMEN

3 m. N. of the present Cleveland, Tenn.; died in the Cherokee Nation, Ind. T., Feb. 4, 1898. He was the eldest son of Rev. Jesse Bushyhead (Unádùtl), a prominent native Baptist minister who was associated with Rev. Evan Jones, the missionary, in his Scripture translations, and was also several times a tribal delegate to Washington. The chief's mother was a half-blood Cherokee, formerly a Miss Wilkinson. As a boy he attended a Presbyterian mission school on Candy cr., w. of Cleveland, Tenn., and also the mission under Rev. Evan Jones at Valleytown, N. C. On the removal of the tribe to Indian Ter., in 1838, he went w. with his father, who was in charge of one detachment of the emigrants numbering 1,200 persons. The start was made in October, the journey occupying 6 months. He afterward for some time attended school in New Jersey. In 1849 he joined the gold rush to California, where he remained until 1868, when he returned to Indian Ter., making his residence at Tahlequah, and entered actively into Cherokee politics. He served two terms as principal chief (1879-86), was subsequently twice appointed tribal delegate to Washington, and in 1890 served as one of the commissioners to treat with the United States for the sale of the Cherokee strip. (J. M.)

Unakagamute.—Petroff in 10th Census, Alaska, 11, 1884. Unakagamut.—Nelson in 18th Rep. B. A. E., 11 ap, 1899.

Unakhotana ('far-off people'). An Athapascan tribe living along the Yukon from Tanana r. down to the Koyukuk and on the latter stream. It is divided into the Koyukukhotana and the Yukonikhotana. Allen (Rep., 143, 1887) estimated the whole tribe at 550.

Unakite. A species of igneous rock, "an irregular crystallization of old-rose feldspar and green epidote" (Phalen in Smithsonian Misc. Coll., Quar. Iss., I, 312, 1904). The name was applied first in 1874 by F. H. Bradley (Am. Jour. Sci., 3d s., vii, 519-520, 1874), from its occurrence in the Unaka mts. between North Carolina and Tennessee. It has also been found near Luray, Va. The -ite is the English suffix of Greek origin, and unaka is derived from one of the Indian languages of the country. (A. F. C.)

Unalachtigo (properly W'nalāchtko, 'people who live near the ocean,' because of their proximity to Delaware bay.—Brinton). The southernmost of the three main divisions of the Delawares, occupying the w. bank of Delaware r., in Delaware, and probably also the e. bank, in New Jersey, since many of the Delawares were forced to cross the river to escape the inroads of the Conestoga. Their totem was the turkey, whence they have been known as the Turkey tribe of the Delawares. According to Brinton the totem has no reference to gentes, but was merely the emblem of a geographic division. Their principal seat was Chikohoki, on the site of Burlington, N. J. (J. M.)

Unalakligemut (Unālāklig'emūt). A subdivision of the Unaligmiut Eskimo of Alaska, inhabiting the banks of Unalaklik r.—Dall in Cont. N. A. Ethnol., I, 17, 1877.

Unalaklik. An Unaligmiut Eskimo village at the mouth of Unalaklik r., Norton sd., Alaska. Pop. 100 in 1880, 175 in 1890. It being the terminus of the winter route from Anvik on the Yukon, the inhabitants are a mixed race of Eskimo and Athapascan.

Unalaska. The larger of the dialectic divisions of the Aleut, occupying the Aleutian ids. w. of Atka and the extremity and n. coast of Alaska penin. Whereas the Atka show some resemblance to Asiatics, probably owing to a mixture of blood since the Russian conquest, these are more akin in appearance, customs, and language to the Kaniagmiut. Fuchs-Aleuten.—Holmberg, Ethnog. Unalga. A former Aleut village on Unalga, Adreanof group, Aleutian ids., Alaska, with 23 inhabitants in 1831.

Oonalga.—Petroff in 10th Census, Alaska, 35, 1884. Oonalgenskoi.—Elliot, Cond. Aff. Alaska, 225, 1876. Unalginakoe.—Veniaminof, Zapiski, II, 203, 1840.

Unalignmiut. A tribe of Alaskan Eskimo inhabiting the e. shore of Norton sd. back to the coast range. They are the northernmost of the fishing tribes of Eskimo, and their racial characteristics have been modified by intermarriage with the stronger western Eskimo, whose raids from the n. decimated the population on Norton sd. until there were only 150 Unalignmiut left by Dall's reckoning in 1875; at the census of 1890, only 110. He distinguished the following subtribes: Kegikowregmiut, Pastoligmiut, Pikmiktaligmiut, and Unalakligemut. Their villages are: Anemuk, Iguik, Kiktaguk, Pikmiktalik, Tachik, Topanika, Unalaklik.

Aziagmüt.—Worman cited by Dall in Cont. N. A. Ethnol., 1, 17, 1877 (see Aziagmut). Oonalignmuto.—Petroff in 10th Census, Alaska, 126, 1884. Tachigmyut.—Turner, Unalit MS. vocab., B. A. E., 1877 (sig. 'bay people'). Tatschigmut.—Wrangell quoted by Dall, op. cit. Tatschigmüten.—Wrangell in Ethnogr. Nachr., 122, 1839. Unaleet.—Dall, op. cit. Unami. One of the principal divisions of the Delawares (q. v.), formerly occupying the Pennsylvania side of Delaware r., from the junction of the Lehigh southward about to the Delaware line. According to Brinton, many of the New Jersey Delawares were Unami who had crossed the Delaware to escape the inroads of the Conestoga, and Rittenber classes with this division the Navasink, Raritan, Hackensack, Aquackanonk, Tappan, and Haverstraw, of northern New Jersey. The Unami held precedence over the other Delawares. Their totem was the turtle (pakoango). According to Morgan, they were one of the three gentes of the Delawares, while Brinton says the turtle was merely the symbol of a geographic division. The Unami have sometimes been called the Turtle tribe of the Delawares. (J. M.)

Pakoango.—Brinton, Lenape Leg., 39, 1885 ('the crawler,' a term descriptive of the turtle). Pokekoo-un'-go.—Morgan, Anc. Soc., 172, 1877 (trans. Unangashik. An Aglemiut Eskimo village at Heiden bay, Alaska penin., Alaska; pop. 37 in 1880, 190 in 1890.

Oonangashik.—Petroff, Map of Alaska, 1880. Oonongashik.—Petroff, Rep. on Alaska, 45, 1880.

Unatak. A Kowagmiut Eskimo village on Kobuk r., Alaska.

Un-nah-tak.—Healy, Cruise of Corwin, 27, 1887.

Una Vida. An important ancient ruin in Chaco canyon, n. w. N. Mex., about 4

m. above Pueblo Bonito. It is situated on uneven ground on the n. side of the arroyo at the base of the canyon wall. The main building is L-shaped, the extremities of the wings being connected by a semicircular wall. The wings are 274 and 253 ft in length. The remains of a partly subterranean circular kiva, 60 ft in diameter, are situated within the court; another is in the inclosure at the angle of the two wings; 3 more are built within the walls of one wing, and another large kiva is outside of the e. wall. The material of which the pueblo was built is grayish yellow sandstone in rather large blocks; the style of masonry is plain, no attempt at ornamentation being found as in other buildings of the group. This building is in a very ruinous condition. Two hundred ft n. w. of the main building, on a point of the bluff about 50 ft above, is another ruin, the principal feature of which is a kiva, 54 ft in diameter, surrounded by 15 to 20 rooms. The ruin is called Saydegil ('house on the side of the rocks') by the Navaho. See Simpson, Exped. to Navajo Country, 78, 1850; Jackson in 10th Rep. Hayden Surv., 1878; Hardacre in Scribner's Mo., 278, Dec. 1878. (E. L. H.)

Uncas (corruption of Wonkus, 'fox,' lit. 'the circler.'—Gerard). A Mohegan chief, son of Owenoco, who in 1626 married a daughter of Sassacus, chief of the Pequot, and became one of their leaders (De Forest, Inds. of Conn., 86, 1852). He was known also as Poquim or Poquoiam. A rebellion against Sassacus led to his defeat and banishment, whereupon he fled to the Narraganset, but soon made his peace and returned. This conduct was repeated several times. He warred against the Pequot, Narraganset, and other tribes. After taking prisoner Miantonomo he executed him at command of the English. He sided with the English in King Philip's war in 1675. His death occurred in 1682 or 1683. The family line became extinct early in the 19th century. De Forest (op. cit., 86) says: "His nature was selfish, jealous, and tyrannical; his ambition was grasping and unrelieved by a single trait of magnanimity." Stratagem and trickery were native to his mind. His personal habits were bad and he was addicted to more than one vice of the whites. He protested against the introduction of Christianity among his people. A monument to his memory was erected by the citizens of Norwich, Conn., in July, 1847, the cornerstone of which was laid by President Jackson in 1833. Another memorial, consisting of a bronze statue surmounting a large boulder, was erected by Mrs Edward Clark, afterward the wife of Bishop H. C. Potter, on the site of the home of James Fenimore Cooper, at Cooperstown, N. Y. (A. F. C.)

Uncowa (from ongkoue, 'beyond,' with reference to Pequannoc r.). A small band formerly living about Fairfield, Fairfield co., Conn. Their village, of the same name, was near the site of Fairfield. They are placed by Ruttenger in the Mattabesec division of the Wappinger group.

Undl-skadjins-gitunai (²*ANT squadj'ns gŭtānā'-i*, 'Gituns on the river Skadjins'). A subdivision of the Gituns, a Haida family of the Eagle clan living at Masset, Brit. Col. The name was derived from that of a small stream which flows into the upper expansion of Masset inlet, and upon which they used to camp.—Swanton, Cont. Haida, 275, 1905.

United States Board of Indian Commissioners. A Board of ten men appointed and directly commissioned by the President of the United States "from men eminent for their intelligence and philanthropy to serve without pecuniary compensation," to use the language of the law which in 1869 created the Board at the suggestion of President Grant, that by its advice and suggestions it might cooperate with the Government in securing a sound and progressive administration of Indian affairs and in promoting the education and civilization of the native American tribes.

The especial significance of the 40 years' history of the Commission lies in the fact that upon an important branch of the Government's administrative work there has been brought to bear enlightened public opinion, through a slowly changing body of men of high character, especially interested in the reforms to be secured, uninfluenced by partisan considerations and free from danger of removal for party advantage when impelled to criticism of administrative faults or defects.

Determined to put an end to needless wars with Indian tribes, President Grant, referring to his "Peace Policy" and to this newly created Commission, in his annual message of December, 1869, said: "I have adopted a new policy toward these wards of the nation (they can not be regarded in any other light than as wards), with fair results, so far as tried, and which I hope will be attended ultimately with great success."

Commissioned under the law of April 10, 1869, the Board began its work under regulations issued by President Grant, which authorized it to inspect the records of the Indian Office and to obtain full information as to the conduct of all parts of the affairs thereof; gave to its members full power to inspect Indian agencies, to be present at payments of annuities, at consultations or councils with Indians; to advise agents respecting their duties; to be present at purchases of goods for Indian purposes; to inspect said purchases, advising with the Commissioner of Indian Affairs in regard thereto; and to advise respecting instructions to agents and changes in the methods of purchasing goods or of conducting the affairs of the Indian Bureau proper.

Among the members of the Commission have been such prominent business men as Felix R. Brunot, of Pittsburg (first chairman of the Board); William Welsh and George H. Stuart, of Philadelphia; William E. Dodge, Gen. Clinton B. Fisk, Darwin R. James, and William H. Lyon, of New York, and John V. Farwell, of Chicago.

Abuses in connection with the purchase of Indian supplies and the business of Indian traders demanded and received immediate attention and drastic reform. The Board advised a change in the methods of purchase, securing strict impartiality in the reception of bids and the allotment of contracts, and a system of rigid inspection after goods have been delivered at a Government warehouse, thus insuring goods in quality and grade equal to the samples offered, preventing fraud, and saving large sums to the Government each year. The system planned and inaugurated by the business men of the Board, after a few years of practical direction by the Commission, was adopted substantially by the Department and is still in use by the Indian Bureau, to the great advantage of the Indians as well as of the Government.

In their first annual report to the President the Board indicated, besides these reforms in business methods, certain lines of work which they proposed to undertake and certain reforms which seemed desirable. They urged that the Indians should be taught as soon as possible the advantages of individual ownership of property; that land in severalty should be given them as soon as it was desired by any; that tribal ownership and tribal relations should be discouraged; that individual titles to land should be made inalienable from the family of the holder for at least two or three generations, and that the Five Civilized Tribes of Indian Ter. should be taxed and made citizens of the United States as soon as possible. They advised that the system of treaties with Indian tribes should be discontinued; and that as soon as a just method to accomplish it could be devised, there should be in the interest of the Indians themselves an abrogation of existing treaties with tribes. They declared it to be the immediate duty of the Government to establish schools and employ teachers, to introduce the English language in every tribe, and especially to educate the Indians in the dignity of work, in the industries and arts of civilization and the principles of Christianity, that Indians might be fitted for citizenship and be made citizens. From the first, the object held in view by the Commission has been the absorption of all Indians as soon as practicable into the body politic as American citizens. Their first report also commended the President for his avowed purpose to select Indian agents with a view to their moral as well as their business qualifications for their work, and aside from political and partisan considerations.

As early as 1878 the Commission made a draft of a bill to allot land and secure homesteads to Indians; and they steadfastly and earnestly advocated that reform, against strong opposition, until its triumph in Congress under the wise and effective leadership of Senator Dawes in the general severalty act of 1887 which justly bears his name. Now that more than 70,000 Indians (besides the 65,000 in Indian Ter., citizens by virtue of the Curtis act, which followed the Dawes act) have become American citizens under the provisions of the Dawes bill, it excites wonder to recall the fact that until this tardy act of justice to Indians in 1887 the only people from any quarter of the globe who could not become American citizens by birth, residence, or naturalization were our own American Indians, the only strictly native-born Americans by race.

To assist in the Christian education of the Indians was urged upon all denominations of Christians as a patriotic duty by President Grant in 1869; and for many years the Board of Indian Commissioners cooperated in this work by holding twice in each year (at the annual meeting of the Board at Washington in January, and at the Lake Mohonk Indian Conference—see Mohonk Indian Conference,—called and entertained by Hon. Albert K. Smiley, a member of the Commission), a conference with the secretaries and workers of the various religious organizations which carried on missions and schools among Indians. After appropriations for Government schools had steadily grown from $20,000 in 1877 to $3,757,909 in 1910 (a growth which the Board has earnestly recommended and steadily favored), and after direct Government aid had been withdrawn from all denominational schools, annual conferences at Washington with representatives of mission societies were for a time discontinued. When the Board was created, fewer than 5,000 Indian children had any kind of school facilities. Now the Government provides school facilities for the children of all Indian tribes except the Navaho; and in 1910 more than 30,000 Indian children were enrolled in schools.

In their first annual report the Board, in speaking of the proposed policy of education, said: "To expect the Christianization and civilization of any barbarous people within the term of a few short years would be to ignore all the facts of history, all the experiences of human nature." Now that for a full generation this independent, nonpartisan Board has continued to act as assistants to the Government, often as interpreters to the public of the policy of the administration, often by criticism and suggestion as exponents to the Government of the thought and sentiment of the most intelligent friends of the Indians, so much of progress is evident that the Commission with great hope and confidence continue their work which looks to the speedy abolition of all tribal relations, and to the discontinuance at the earliest practicable date of all special supervision of Indians by the Government.

For the last 10 years the Board has warmly advocated breaking up into individual holdings the immense tribal funds now held in trust by the Government. They advocate the fixing of an early date after which no child born to Indians shall have any right to a share in tribal funds save as he may inherit from others their divided interest under the laws of the state or territory where he may reside, and the division of tribal funds into individual holdings, each Indian entitled to a share to be recognized on the books of the Treasury of the United States; payments of interest to be made directly to the individual Indian by name, the principal to be paid to individual Indians whenever in the opinion of the President they may be fit to receive and use it. So only, in the opinion of the Board, can Indians be trained to use their property. The keeping of permanent family records at each agency, with this purpose in view; the strengthening of family life among the Indians by requiring a license for marriage and by active measures to prevent polygamy, are regulations adopted recently by the Government at the urgent request of the Board.

The chairmen of the Board have been Felix R. Brunot (1869-73), Clinton B. Fisk (1874-77, and 1880-89), A. C. Barstow (1878-79), Merrill E. Gates, (1890-99), Darwin R. James (1899-1909). Francis E. Leupp, former Commissioner of Indian Affairs; Charles J. Bonaparte, Attorney-General of the United States, and Maurice F. Egan, present minister to Denmark, are among recent members of the Board. Gen. Eliphalet Whittlesey was its secretary from 1882 to 1899. Its present (1910) officers and members are: Andrew S. Draper, chairman; Merrill E. Gates, secretary; and Commissioners Albert K. Smiley, William D. Walker, Joseph T. Jacobs, Patrick J. Ryan, Andrew S. Draper, George Vaux, jr., Warren K. Moorehead, and Samuel A. Eliot. The office of the Board is Corcoran Building, Washington, D. C. (M. E. G.)

Unkagarits (Un'-ka-gar-its). One of the tribes known under the collective term Gosiutes, formerly in Skull valley, s. w. Utah; pop. 149 in 1873.—Powell and Ingalls in Ind. Aff. Rep. 1873, 51, 1874.

Unkakaniguts (Un-ka-ka'-ni-guts, 'red land people'). A Paiute band formerly in Long valley, s. w. Utah; pop. 36 in 1873.

Un-ka-ka'-ni-guts.—Powell in Ind. Aff. Rep. 1873, 50, 1874. Unkar kauagats-Ta-Nouts.—Ingalls in H. R. Ex. Doc. 66, 42d Cong., 3d sess., 2, 1873.

Unkapanukuints (Unkápa nu-kwints, 'redwater river people'). A Paiute band near Cedar City, s. w. Utah. Pop. 97 in 1873. In 1904 there were 30 Paiute near Cedar City, probably the remnant of this band.

Nu-kwints.—Powell misquoted in Sen. Ex. Doc. 42, 43d Cong., 1st sess., 15, 1874 (separated from Un-ka-pa by comma). Un-ka-pa.—Ibid. Unka'-pa-Nu-kuints.—Powell in Ind. Aff. Rep. 1873, 50, 1874. Unka-toma.—Ingalls in H. R. Ex. Doc. 66, 42d Cong., 3d sess., 2, 1873 (probably identical).

Unkcheyuta ('eat dung'). A Miniconjou Sioux band.

Unkée-yuta.—Dorsey, after Swift, in 15th Rep. B. A. E., 220, 1897. Unktée-yuta.—Ibid.

Unkoahs. Given by Doty (Ind. Aff. Rep. 1864, 175, 1865) as one of the two chief bands of the western Shoshoni, but they may have been Paiute.

Unktoka ('our enemies'). A tribe which, according to the Iowa, formerly lived in n. Wisconsin and was destroyed by them about the beginning of the 19th century.—Lynd in Minn. Hist. Soc. Coll., II, pt. 2, 59, 1864.

Unojita. One of 36 tribes reported in 1683 to Domingo de Mendoza as being friendly to the Jumano and living three days' journey eastward from the junction of the Rio Grande and Conchos rs., in Texas.—Mendoza, Viaje, 1683-84, MS. in Archivo Gen. de México.

Unshagii (Un'-shā-gi-i'). A former pueblo of the Jemez of New Mexico; definite location unknown.—Hodge, field notes, B. A. E., 1895.

Unuwat. A "castle" of the Mahican, taking its name from the chief, situated on the e. bank of Hudson r. in Rensselaer co., N. Y.—Ruttenber, Tribes Hudson R., 85, 1872.

Unyijaima. Mentioned as a village, presumably Costanoan, formerly connected with San Juan Bautista mission, Cal.

Unijaima.—Engelhardt, Franc. in Cal., 398, 1897.

Unyjaware (Iroquois name). One of the 5 Abnaki villages in 1700.—Bellomont (1700) in N. Y. Doc. Col. Hist., iv, 758, 1854.

Upan ('elk'). A gens of the Kansa. O'-pā.—Morgan, Anc. Soc., 156, 1877. O-pāh-nika-shing-ga.—Stubbs, Kaw MS. vocab., B. A. E., 25, 1877. Upa.—Dorsey in 15th Rep. B. A. E., 231, 1897.

Uparch. A Maricopa rancheria on the Rio Gila, Arizona, in the 18th century.

S. Felipe Uparch.—Sedelmair (1744) cited by Bancroft, Ariz. and N. Mex., 366, 1889. Uparch.—Rudo Ensayo (ca. 1763), 22, 1863.

Upasoitac. A Maricopa rancheria near the great bend of the Rio Gila, Ariz., visited by Anza in 1744, and by Anza, Font, Garcés, and others, in 1775.

Opasoitac.—Arricivita (1791) cited by Bancroft, Ariz. and N. Mex., 390, 1889. Pocociom.—Anza and Font (1780), ibid., 392. Pueblo de los Santos Apostoles San Simon y Judas.—Garcés (1775), Diary, 113, 1900. San Simon y Judas de Vpasoitac.—Garcés (1776), ibid., 455. S. Simon.—Arricivita, op. cit. S. Simon y Judas de Opasoitac.—Anza and Font (1780) cited by Bancroft, op. cit., 392. Upasoitac.—Ibid. Vparsoytac.—Garcés (1775), Diary, 138, 1900.

Upervivik. A Danish post in w. Greenland, lat. 74°. It contains 4 frame houses, occupied by Danish officers and their families, a wooden church, and a number of Eskimo huts made of turf.—Bessels, Am. Nordpol-Exped., 85, 1878.

Upeshipow. A tribe, related to the Cree, living near the e. coast of James bay, Canada, between Rupert and Great Whale rs., bordering on the Eskimo of Labrador. One band, the Winnepeskowuk, lived on East Main r., another was said to live on Moose r., probably the Monsoni, who were doubtless a cognate if not the same tribe.

Up-shi-pow.—Hutchins (1770) quoted by Richardson, Arct. Exped., II, 38, 1851.

Upop (U-póp). A Chumashan village formerly near Pt Concepcion, Cal.—Henshaw, Buenaventura MS. vocab., B. A. E., 1884.

Upper Chinook. A general term for the Chinookan tribes of Columbia r., above (E. of) the Lower Chinook. As commonly used it refers to the tribes between the mouth of Willamette r. and The Dalles, Oreg.

Hauts-Tchinouks.—Mofras, Expl. dans l'Oregon, II, 335, 1844. Tchaxlátxksh.—Gatschet, op. cit. (Clackama name). Upper Chinook.—Hale in U. S. Expl. Exped., VI, 214, 1846.

Upper Cowlitz. A division of the Cowlitz on the upper waters of Cowlitz r., Wash.

Upper Creeks. A term applied to that division of the Creeks formerly living about Coosa and Tallapoosa rs., N. E. Ala., and for a short distance below their junction. Lincoln in 1798 (Am. State Papers, Ind. Aff., I, 79, 1832) stated that there were about 45 Upper Creek towns. See Creeks.

Maakō'ki Hatchapála.—Gatschet, Creek Migr. Leg., I, 237, 1884 (Creek name). Overhill Creeks.—Lee quoted by Drake, Bk. Inds., bk. IV, 68, 1848. The Nation.—Bartram, Trav., 208, 1791. Upper Creeks.—Ibid., 378.

Upper Fraser Band. One of 4 subdivisions of the Upper Ntlakyapamuk of the interior of British Columbia.

Slaxa'yux.—Telt in Mem. Am. Mus. Nat. Hist., II, 170, 1900. Upper Fraser band.—Ibid.

Upper Kutenai. The larger of the 2 divisions of the Kutenai, speaking a different dialect and more amenable to civilizing influences than the Lower Kutenai. They live in the region inclosed between Selkirk and the Rocky mts., on the lakes at the head of Columbia r., and on Upper Kootenai r. and L. Pend d' Oreille, Brit. Col. Their subdivisions are Akiskenukenik, Akamnik, Akanekunik, and Akiyenik.

Ki'tōnā'qa.—Chamberlain in 8th Rep. N. W. Tribes Can., 6, 1892. Upper Kootanais.—Mayne, Brit. Col., 298, 1862. Upper Kootanie.—Tolmie and Dawson, Comp. Vocab., 124B, 1884. Upper Kootenay.—Boas in 5th Rep. N. W. Tribes Can., 10, 1889. Upper Kootenuha.—Tolmie and Dawson, op. cit.

Upper Mdewakanton. The northern bands of the Mdewakanton Sioux in Minnesota.

Upper Me-dé-wakan-t'wan.—Ramsey in Ind. Aff. Rep. 1849, 81, 1850.

Upper St. Croix Lake Band. A band of the Munominikasheenhug.

Upper Sioux. The Sisseton and Wahpeton Sioux, on upper Minnesota r., as distinguished from the Lower Sioux (Mdewakanton and Wahpekute).—Ind. Aff. Rep., 1859, 101, 1860.

Upper Takelma. A Takelman tribe that dwelt eastward of the Takelma proper, occupying the poorer land of the upper Rogue, eastward from about Table Rock toward the Cascades and in the neighborhood of the present town of Jacksonville, Oreg. These eastern Takelma seem to have been on the whole less advanced than their down-river kinsmen. They are said to have been shorter in stature than these, to have used log rafts instead of canoes, and, because of greater economic distress, to have used for food crows, ants' eggs, and the like, much to the disgust of the Takelma proper, who, however, do not seem to have been particularly averse to the eating of lice and grasshoppers themselves. The Upper Takelma were much more warlike than their western neighbors, and were accustomed to make raids on the latter in order to procure supplies of food and other valuables. The slaves they captured they often sold to the Klamath of the Lakes, directly to the E. The few words obtained of their language show it to have been very nearly the same as that of the Takelma proper, but with distinct phonetic and lexicographic dialectic differences. (E. S.)

Lat'gā-wā.—Sapir in Am. Anthr., IX, 252, 1907 ('those living in the uplands': Takelma name).

Wālx.—Sapir, ibid. ('enemies': also sometimes so called by the Takelma, although applied specifically to the Shasta).

Upper Thompson Indians. The Ntlakyapamuk on Fraser r. and its tributaries above Cisco, Brit. Col. They embody 4 minor divisions: the Lytton, Upper Fraser, Spences Bridge, and Nicola bands.

Nku'kūmamux.—Telt in Mem. Am. Mus. Nat. Hist., II, 168, 1900 (= 'people above'). Upper Thompsons.—Ibid.

Upper Yanktonai. One of the two principal local divisions of the Yanktonai Sioux, so named because their habitat was farther up Missouri r. than that of the Hunkpatina (U. S. Ind. Treat., II, 905, 1904). They include the Wazikute, Takini, Shikshichena, Kiyuksa, and Pabaksa.

North Yanktons.—Prescott in Schoolcraft, Ind. Tribes, II, 169, note, 1852. Upper Yanotonais.—Stanley in Poole, Among the Sioux, app., 231, 1881. Yank-ton of the north or plains.—Lewis and Clark Discov., table, 84, 1806. Yanktons of the North.—Ibid., 24. Yanktons of the Plains.—Lewis and Clark Exped., I, 61, 1814.

Upputuppet. Mentioned by Kane (Wand. in N. Am., 274, 1859) as a band numbering 70 or 80 warriors at the mouth of Palouse r., Wash. The term is not met with elsewhere and probably refers to a division or a settlement of the Palocs.

Uracas. Mentioned in connection with some mythical as well as existent tribes of the plains in the 17th century.—Vetancurt (1693) in Teatro Am., III, 303, 1871.

Uracha. A tribe or band represented by one individual at San Antonio de Valero mission, Texas, in 1764 (Valero Baptisms, 1764, partida 1500, MS.). There is no indication of the tribe's affiliation.

Urchaoztac. A Maricopa rancheria on the Rio Gila, Ariz., in 1744.—Sedelmair (1744) cited by Bancroft, Ariz. and N. Mex., 366, 1889.

Urebure. A village, presumably Costanoan, formerly connected with Dolores mission, San Francisco, Cal.—Taylor in Cal. Farmer, Oct. 18, 1861.

Ures (Opata: uri, 'man'). A former pueblo of the Opata, containing also Nevome, and the seat of a Spanish mission founded in 1636; situated on the E. bank of the E. branch of Rio Sonora, central Sonora, Mex. Pop. 904 in 1678, 592 in 1730. The name was applied also to the inhabitants, and Ure and Ore were sometimes used synonymously with Opata. Orozco y Berra (Geog., 58, 351, 1864) classes Ures both as a Nevome pueblo and as an Opata division. Bandelier (Arch. Inst. Papers, III, 58, 1890) says the Ures were Opata. After the extermination of the Salineros and Cabezas of Tizonezo, in Durango, that pueblo was repopled by some of the Ures inhabitants. Ures is now a Mexicanized town of 2,350 inhabitants, including descendants of the former Opata population and a number of Yaqui. See Corazones.

Hures.—Ribas (1645) quoted in Arch. Inst. Papers, III, pt. 1, 58, 1890. San Miguel Ures.—Zapata (1678) quoted by Bancroft, No. Mex. States, 245, 1884. Ures.—Kino, map (1702) in Stöcklein, Neue Welt-Bott, 74, 1726.

Ur'thlaina tai'na.—M. C. Stevenson, notes, B. A. E., 1910 (tai'na = 'people').

Urihesahe. Mentioned as a Choctaw clan (Wright in Ind. Aff. Rep., 348, 1843). Not identified.

Urn-burial. This method of disposing of the dead, which consisted of the burial of cremated or noncremated human remains in vessels that were covered, uncovered, or inverted over the remains, was practised in places by the Indians, from ocean to ocean, in the territory now forming the United States, principally in the S., but nowhere has it been found to be exclusive and apart from other forms of burial. The custom continued into the historical period (Yarrow, Moore). Noncremated human remains were buried in vessels of stone, covered in various ways, in s. California (Yarrow), the only locality in the United States where stone vessels are known to have been used for burial purposes. Similar remains have been found in a covered receptacle of earthenware in Tennessee (Holmes). In Alabama, where alone plural burials of noncremated remains in a single vessel are sometimes met with, unburned human bones have been found in vessels with and without covers, as is also the case in Georgia. In N. Florida two bowls containing noncremated remains were found with vessels inverted above them (Moore). Cremated human remains in covered vessels have been unearthed in Arizona (Hough, Cushing, Fewkes, Hrdlička); in large seashells and in shells of turtles in Illinois (McAdams); in an urn in Michigan (Gillman), and in vessels, variously covered or uncovered, in Georgia (Moore). In Georgia, also, human remains, sometimes cremated and sometimes not, were placed on the sand with vessels of earthenware inverted above them (Moore). In s. California entire skeletons having the skulls covered with inverted stone mortars, and in one case with an inverted metal pan, are said to have been found (Yarrow); and earthenware bowls were similarly turned over skulls belonging to entire skeletons in Arizona (Fewkes; Hodge, inf'n, 1904), in New Mexico (Duff; Hewett, inf'n, 1904), and in two instances in lower Alabama (Moore). In Utah burials of noncremated remains have been found covered with baskets (Pepper). Urn-burial was not practised by the tribes occupying peninsular Florida, but in the N. W. part of that state, urn-burial consisting, with but few exceptions, of lone skulls sometimes accompanied with fragments of other bones placed on the sand and covered by inverted bowls have been found (Moore). In South Carolina urn-burial probably was practised, but authentic details are wanting. Published reports of the discovery of urn-burials in Missouri, Indiana, and Kentucky have been shown to be incorrect.

Uscamacu. A tribe or village mentioned by La Vandra (B. Smith, Colec. Doc. Fla., I, 16, 1857) as a day's journey from St Helena, which was visited by Juan Pardo in 1567. Not identified, but possibly the Yamasee of N. Florida or S. South Carolina.

Escamacu.—Barcia, Ensayo, 141, 1723.

Ushu. The Columnar Cactus clan of the Chua (Snake) phratry of the Hopi.

Ucü wiñwü.—Fewkes in 19th Rep. B. A. E., 582, 1900. Ü'-cü wuñ-wü.—Fewkes in Am. Anthr., VII, 402, 1894 (wuñ-wü = clan). Ü'-se.—Stephen in 8th Rep. B. A. E., 38, 1891.

Usi. A village, probably on the coast of South Carolina, in 1569; distant about 60 leagues "by salt water" from Santa Elena, about the present Beaufort.—Juan de la Vandra (1569) in Smith, Colec. Doc. Fla., I, 17, 1857.

Uskwaliguta. See Hanging-maw.

Ussa Yoholo. See Osceola.

Ussete. A village, presumably Costanoan, formerly connected with Dolores mission, San Francisco, Cal.—Taylor in Cal. Farmer, Oct. 18, 1861.

Ustanali (U'stāna'li, denoting a natural barrier of rocks across a stream). The name of several former Cherokee settlements. One was on Keowee r., below the present Ft George, in Oconee co., S. C.; another seems to have been somewhere on the waters of Tuckasegee r., in W. North Carolina; a third, prominent during and after the Revolutionary period, was just above the junction of Coosawatee and Conasauga rs. to form the Oostanaula, in Gordon co., Ga., and adjoining New Echota. Other settlements of the same name may have been on Eastanollee cr. of Tugaloo r., in Franklin co., Ga., and on Eastanaula cr., flowing into Hiwassee r., in McMinn co., Tenn. In addition to the forms cited below, the name is variously spelled Eastinaulee, Eastanora, Estanaula, Eustenaree, Istanare, Oostanaula, Ustenary, etc.—Mooney in 19th Rep. B. A. E., 543, 1900.

Oos-te-nau-lah.—Royce in 5th Rep. B. A. E., map, 1887. Oostinawley.—Doc. of 1799 quoted by Royce, ibid., 144. Oostonoos.—Barcia, Ensayo, 261, 1723 (identical?). Oustanale.—Doc. of 1755 quoted by Royce, op. cit., 143. Oustanalle.—Ibid.

Ustisti. Mentioned in a document of 1755 as one of the Cherokee lower towns. It is also said to have been the

Oostomas.—Powers in Overland Mo., XII, 420, 1874. Us-tó-ma.—Powers in Cont. N. A. Ethnol., III, 282, 1877. Ustu.—Bancroft, Nat. Races, I, 450, 1874.

Utaca. One of 36 tribes reported in 1683 to Domingo de Mendoza as being friendly to the Jumano and living three days' journey eastward from the junction of the Rio Grande and the Conchos, in Texas.—Mendoza, Viaje, 1683–84, MS. in Archivo Gen. de México.

Utagami ('middle of the river'). An extinct band of the Peoria.

Utahlite. A hydrous phosphate of aluminum somewhat similar to turquoise and capable of being highly polished. Although rare, its occurrence has been noted in certain prehistoric ruins in Utah, having been employed by the ancient Pueblo inhabitants evidently for ornaments. From Utah, the state name, which in turn is derived from that of the Ute or Uta tribe.

Utalliam. A Costanoan village situated in 1819 within 10 m. of Santa Cruz mission, Cal.—Taylor in Cal. Farmer, Apr. 5, 1860.

Utchowig. A village, probably belonging to the Erie, situated in 1608 on a w. tributary of the Susquehanna, in Pennsylvania.—Smith (1629), Va., I, map, repr. 1819.

Utchuchu. A village, presumably Costanoan, formerly connected with San Juan Bautista mission, Cal.—Taylor in Cal. Farmer, Nov. 25, 1860.

Ute. An important Shoshonean division, related linguistically to the Paiute, Chemehuevi, Kawaiisu, and Bannock. They formerly occupied the entire central and w. portions of Colorado and the E. portion of Utah, including the E. part of Salt Lake valley and Utah valley. On the S. they extended into New Mexico, occupying much of the upper drainage area of the San Juan. They appear to have always been a warlike people, and early came into possession of horses, which intensified their aggressive character. None of the tribes practised agriculture. Very little is known of their social and political organization, although the seven Ute tribes of Utah were at one time organized into a confederacy under chief Tabby (Taiwi). Dialectic differences exist in the language, but these do not appear to be great and probably presented little difficulty to intercourse between the several bands or geographical bodies. In the N. part of their range, in Utah, they appear to have become considerably intermixed by marriage with their Shoshoni, Bannock, and Paiute kindred, and on the s. with the Jicarilla Apache.

The first treaty with the Ute, one of peace and amity, was concluded Dec. 30, 1849. By Executive order of Oct. 3, 1861, Uintah valley was set apart for the Uinta tribe and the remainder of the land claimed by them was taken without formal purchase. By treaty of Oct. 7, 1863, the Tabeguache were assigned a reservation and the remainder of their land was ceded to the United States. On May 5, 1864, various reserves, established in 1856 and 1859 by Indian agents, were ordered vacated and sold. By treaty of Mar. 2, 1868, a reservation for the Tabeguache, Moache, Capote, Wiminuche, Yampa, Grand River, Uinta, and other bands was created in Colorado and the remainder of their lands relinquished; but by agreement of Sept. 13, 1873, a part of this reservation was ceded to the United States. When it was found that a portion of this last cession was included in the Uncompahgre valley, the part so included was retroceded to the Ute by Executive order of Aug. 17, 1876. By Executive order of Nov. 22, 1875, the Ute res. was enlarged, but this additional tract was restored to the public domain by order of Aug. 4, 1882. By act of June 18, 1878, a portion of the act of May 5, 1864, was repealed and several tracts included in the reservations thereunder established were restored to the public domain. Under agreement of Nov. 9, 1878, the Moache, Capote, and Wiminuche ceded their right to the confederated Ute res. established by the 1868 treaty, the United States agreeing to establish a reservation for them on San Juan r., which was done by Executive order of Feb. 7, 1879. On Mar. 6, 1880, the Southern Ute and the Uncompahgre acknowledged an agreement to settle respectively on La Plata r. and on the Grand near the mouth of the Gunnison, while the White River Ute agreed to move to the Uinta res. in Utah. Sufficient agricultural land not being found at the point designated as the future home of the Uncompahgre, the President, by Executive order of Jan. 5, 1882, established a reserve for them in Utah, the boundaries of which were defined by Executive order of Jan. 5, 1882. By act of May 24, 1888, a part of the Uinta reservation was restored to the public domain.

The Southern Ute lands in Colorado were in part subsequently allotted in severalty, and on Apr. 13, 1899, 523,079 acres were opened to settlement, the remainder (483,750 acres) being retained as a reservation for the Wiminuche. A large part of the Uinta valley res. in Utah has also been allotted in severalty, more than a million acres set aside as forest and other reserves, and more than a million acres more opened to homestead entry; the residue (179,194 acres under reclamation) is unallotted and unreserved. Of the Uncompahgre res. in Utah, 12,540 acres have been allotted and the remainder restored to the public domain by act of June 7, 1897.

Various numerical estimates of the Ute have been made from time to time, but they are generally unreliable. The restless character of these Indians and their unfriendly spirit have rendered a correct census or even a fair estimate impossible. Some estimates have included many Paiute, while others have included only a portion of the Ute proper, so that the figures have varied from 3,000 to 10,000. An estimate of 4,000 for the year 1870 would probably be within safe bounds. It is not likely that the combined numbers of the several Ute bands ever exceeded 10,000. The official reports give 3,391 as on the several reservations in 1885, and 2,014 in 1909. They have been classed as follows: Capote, Cumunbah, Kosunata, Moache, Pahvant, Pikakwanarata, Sanpet, Seuvarita, Tabeguache, Timpaiavata, Uinta, Wiminuche, Yampa. According to Hrdlička the three divisions now recognized by the Ute are Tabeguache or Uncompahgre, Kaviawach or White River Ute, and Yoovte or Uinta. Sogup and Yubuin-cariri are given as the names of former bands. Most of the divisional names have become obsolete, at least in official reports, and the Ute on the several reservations are now classed under collective terms. These, with their numbers in 1909, were as follows: Wiminuche under the Ft Lewis school, Colo., 454; Capote and Moache under the Southern Ute school, Colo., 352; Uinta (443), Uncompahgre (469), and White River Ute (296) under the Uintah and Ouray agency, Utah.

In July, 1879, about 100 men of the White River agency, Colo., roamed from their reservation into s. Wyoming to hunt. During this time some forests were fired by railway tiemen, resulting in great loss of timber, and calling forth complaint against the Indians, who were ordered to remain henceforth on their reservation. In Sept. the agent, Meeker, was assaulted after a quarrel with a petty chief, and requested military aid, which was granted. Orders were later issued for the arrest of the Indians charged with the recent forest fires, and Maj. Thornburgh was sent with a force of 190 men. Suspecting the outcome, the Indians procured ammunition from neighboring traders and informed the agent that the appearance of the troops would be regarded as an act of war. On Sept. 20 Thornburgh's detachment was ambushed, and their leader and 13 men were killed. The command fell back. On Oct. 2 a company of cavalry arrived, and 3 days later Col. Merritt with 600 troops reached the scene. Atornear the agency the bodies of Meeker and 7 employees were found; all but one of the agency buildings had been rifled and burned. The conflict was soon ended, mainly through the peaceful attitude and influence of chief Ouray.

In the summer of 1906 about 400 Ute, chiefly of the White River band, left their allotments and the Uintah res. in Utah to go to the Pine Ridge res., S. Dak., there to enjoy an unrestricted communal life. They made the journey leisurely, and although no depredations were committed on the way, settlers became alarmed. Every peaceful effort was made to induce the absentees to return to Utah, but all excepting 45, who returned home, remained obdurate, and after having been charged with petty thefts while in Wyoming, the matter was placed under the jurisdiction of the War Department, troops were sent to the scene in October, and the Indians accompanied them peacefully to Ft Meade, S. Dak., in November. In the following spring (1907) arrangements were made whereby the absentee Ute were assigned 4 townships of the Cheyenne River res., S. Dak., which was leased by the Government, at the expense of the Ute annuity fund, for 5 years. The Indians were removed in June to their new lands, where they remained until the following June (1908), when, at their own request, they were returned to their old home in Utah, arriving there in October. Utina (Timucua: uti, land; na, my: 'my country'). In the narrative of the French Huguenot colony in Florida, 1564, Utina, Ouae Utina, or Olata Ouae Utina, is given as the name of the head chief of the Timucua, and on the De Bry map of 1591 (Le Moyne, Narr., 1885) we find Utina as a town within the same territory. It appears, however, to be a title rather than a geographic or personal name, and does not occur in subsequent Spanish history. Olata, or holata, is one of the Timucua titles for "chief," and it has been adopted into the Creek language. Utina. In the narrative of De Soto's expedition it is stated that the Spaniards passed a town, apparently about Suwannee r., called Utinama (Gentl. of Elvas, 1557) or Utinamocharra (Ranjel, ca. 1546), probably a confusion between a title and a proper name. The ma is a locative suffix; the mocharra remains unexplained. The town probably belonged to the Potano tribe. (J. M.)

Utinamocharra.—Ranjel (ca. 1546), in Bourne, De Soto Narr., II, 70, 1904 (N. W. Florida, 1539).

Utinomanoc. Mentioned as one of the tribes from which neophytes were drawn by San Francisco Solano mission, Cal. It was probably Moquelumnan. See Bancroft, Hist. Cal., II, 506, 1886; Engelhardt, Franc. in Cal., 451, 1897; Barrett in Univ. Cal. Pub., VI, no. 1, 44, 1908.

Utinom. The branch of the Yuki of N. California that inhabited the angle between the confluence of Middle and South Eel rs. and extended westward across South Eel r.

Utkiavi ('high place'). The village of the Utkiavinmiut Eskimo at C. Smyth, Alaska, lat. 71° 23'; pop. 225 in 1880. A Government station was established there in 1881.

Uturituc (Pima: 'the corner,' because it was situated at the angle of the new and the old stream beds of the Gila). A former Pima village on the Rio Gila, probably on the site of the present Sacaton, about 3 Spanish leagues N. W. of Casa Grande ruin, S. Ariz. It was visited by Garcés and Anza in 1775, at which time it contained 300 inhabitants. See Anza in Bancroft, Ariz. and N. Mex., 389, 1889; Anza and Font, ibid., 392; Garcés (1775-76), Diary, 65, 1900; Bartlett, Pers. Narr., II, 268, 1854.

Uulgo. Mentioned by Rivera (Diario, leg. 1514, 1736) with the Pima, Opata, Jova, Eudeve, Yaqui, Seri, and Tepoca, apparently as a tribe of n. w. Mexico. Not identified, and seemingly a misprint of some other name.

Upon. See Black drink, Yopon.

Uva. A Chumashan tribe of the Tulare basin, Cal., reduced in 1851 to 20 individuals through conflict with the Spaniards and neighboring tribes. They joined with other small tribes in the treaty of June 10, 1851, by which they reserved a tract between Tejon pass and Kern r., and ceded the remainder of their lands to the United States.

Uras.—Barbour in Sen. Ex. Doc. 4, 32d Cong., spec. sess., 124, 1853. Uvas.—Barbour in Ind. Aff. Rep., 233, 1851.

Uwarrow Suk-suk.—Kane, Arct. Explor., II, 235, 1856.

Uyak. A Kaniagmiut Eskimo village near the Salmon canneries, on Uyak bay, Kodiak id., Alaska. Pop. 76 in 1880; fewer than 20 in 1890.

Bobrowskoje.—Holmberg, Ethnog. Skizz., map, 1855. Ooiak.—Petroff in 10th Census, Alaska, 29, 1884. Ooiatak.—Lisianski (1805) quoted by Baker, Geog. Dict. Alaska, 1902. Ugujuk.—Holmberg, op. cit. Uyak.—11th Census, Alaska, 79, 1893.

Uzela. An Apalachee (?) village visited by DeSoto in 1539, just before reaching the principal town of the tribe, and probably not far from the present Tallahassee, Fla. Uzela.—Gentl. of Elvas (1557) in French, Hist. Coll. La., II, 134, 1850.

Uzinki (Russian: 'narrow'). A village of Kaniagmiut creoles on Spruce id., Kodiak group, Alaska. Pop. 45 in 1880; 74 in 1890.

Oozinkie.—Petroff in 10th Census, Alaska, 28, 1884. Uzinkie.—11th Census, Alaska, 74, 1893.

Uzutihi. A Quapaw band and ancient village. There still survived in 1891 certain gentes belonging to it. The first mention of the village, unless found in some of the names of De Soto's chroniclers, is probably the Atotchasi of Marquette's map (1673). Ototchassi of Thevenot is greatly out of place, as are most of the names on his map. In 1727 Poisson located it near the French fort on Arkansas r., near its mouth.

Vaaf (Va'-af). Apparently a gentile organization among the Pima, belonging to the Suwuki Ohimal, or Red Ants, phratral group.—Russell in 26th Rep. B. A. E., 197, 1908.

Vaba. A rancheria, probably Cochimi, under Purísima (Cadegomo) mission, on the Pacific coast of Lower California in the 18th century.—Doc. Hist. Mex., 4th s., v, 189, 1857.

Vabacahel ('water of the rancheria'). A rancheria, probably Cochimi, connected with Purísima (Cadegomo) mission, Lower California, in the 18th century.—Doc. Hist. Mex., 4th s., v, 189, 1857.

Vachinápuchic ('the pass straight ahead'). A Tarahumare rancheria about 25 m. N. E. of Norogachic, Chihuahua, Mexico.—Lumholtz, inf'n, 1894.

Vacoregue (Nahuatl: atl, 'water'; core, 'the turning'; hui, 'place of': 'place of the turn of the river.'—Buelna). A division of the Cahita on the lower Rio Fuerte and the coast between that river and the Rio Sinaloa, in Sinaloa, Mexico. Besides the Vacoregue proper this division embraced the Ahome, Batucari, Comopori, and Guazave—all named from their settlements and speaking the same dialect of the Cahita. They eked out a livelihood by fishing, and after being converted to Christianity founded a town on the Rio Fuerte, not far from Ahome.

Bacoregues.—Bancroft, No. Mex. States, I, 214, 1886. Bacorehui.—Ribas quoted by Brinton, Am.

Race, 127, 1891. Guasave.—Ibid., map (Vacoregue, or). Guasave.—Orozco y Berra, Geog., 58, 1864. Vacoregue.—Ibid.

Vaeachachio (vae, 'pasture'; chic, 'place of'). A small rancharia of the Tarahumare near Norogachic, Chihuahua, Mexico.—Lumholtz, inf'n, 1904.

Vagerpe. A village, presumably Costanoan, formerly connected with Dolores mission, San Francisco, Cal.—Taylor in Cal. Farmer, Oct. 18, 1861.

Vagitchichate. A Kaiyukhotana village near the mouth of Innoko r., w. Alaska.—Zagoskin in Nouv. Ann. Voy., 5th ser., xxi, map, 1850.

Kushichagat.—Tikhmenief quoted by Baker, Geog. Dict. Alaska, 365, 1901. Vashichagat.—Zagoskin quoted by Petroff in 10th Census, Alaska, 37, 1884.

Vahadha ('tobacco'). Given by Bourke (Jour. Am. Folk-lore, ii, 181, 1889) as a clan of the Mohave (q. v.).

Vahia.—Engelhardt, Franc. in Cal., 404, 1897. Vaticá.—Ibid.

Vahichi ('swamp'). A small rancharia of the Tarahumare near Norogachic, Chihuahua, Mexico.—Lumholtz, inf'n, 1894.

Vajademin. A rancharia, probably Cochimi, under Purísima (Cadegomo) mission, Lower California, in the 18th century.—Doc. Hist. Mex., 4th s., v, 188, 1857.

Vakasnachiki ('plenty of reeds,' or 'place where reeds shoot up'). A Tarahumare rancharia in Chihuahua, Mexico.—Lumholtz, inf'n, 1894.

Valebo ('large mesa'). A small rancharia of the Tarahumare near Norogachic, Chihuahua, Mexico.—Lumholtz, inf'n, 1894.

Valle (Span.: 'valley'). A former village of the central Papago, probably in Pima co., Ariz., with 97 families in 1865.—Davidson in Ind. Aff. Rep., 135, 1865.

Vallecillo (Span.: 'little valley'). An Opata pueblo visited by Coronado in 1540; situated in the valley of the Rio Sonora, n. w. Mexico, in the vicinity of Arizpe. Probably identical with a village later known by another name.

El Vallecillo.—Castañeda, Relación (1596), in Ternaux-Compans, Voy., ix, 158, 1838. Little Valley.—Winship in 14th Rep. B. A. E., 515, 1896.

Valle de las Viejas (Span.: 'valley of the old ones'). A former Diegueño village in San Diego co., Cal.—Hayes (1850) quoted by Bancroft, Nat. Races, i, 458, 1882.

Valleytown (native name Gú'ndhitúñ'yí, 'long place'). A former Cherokee settlement where now is the town of the same name, on Valley r., in Cherokee co., N. C. The various settlements on Valley r. and the adjacent part of Hiwassee were known collectively as the "Valley towns." (J. M.)

Vánca. A tribe, evidently Coahuiltecan, met by Massanet (Diary, in Mem. de Nueva España, xxvii, 94, MS.) in 1691 w. of Rio Hondo, Texas, together with the Patchal, Papañaca, and others.

Vareato. Mentioned, in connection with Puaray, apparently as a pueblo of the Tigua of New Mexico in 1598.—Oñate (1598) in Doc. Inéd., xvi, 115, 1871.

Varohio. A division of the Tarahumare in w. Chihuahua and s. e. Sonora, Mexico, mainly on the Rio Chinipas, but extending n. to the town of Loreto and w. to the Rio Mayo. It includes the Chinipa, Guailopo, Maguiaqui, Hizo, Husoron, Cuteco, and Tecargoni. The Varohio proper occupied Loreto and Santa Ana pueblos.

Chinipa.—Orozco y Berra, Geog., 58, 1864 (used synonymously with Varohio, but strictly only a division thereof.) Huarogio.—Lumholtz in Scribner's Mag., xvi, 31, 32, July, 1894; Lumholtz in Proc. Int. Cong. of Anthr., 103, 1894. Varogio.—Orozco y Berra, Geog., 58, 1864. Varohio.—Ibid. Voragio.—Ibid.

Vases. See Pottery, Receptacles.

Vasisa. One of the 7 Apalachee towns named in a letter from the chiefs of the tribe to the King of Spain in 1688; situated probably on Wacissa r., Jefferson co., Fla., and evidently destroyed by the English and their Indian allies under Gov. Moore in 1704. In 1822 Creek (i. e. Seminole) immigrants from Chhattahoocheer occupied a town called Wacissatalofa, 'Wacissa town,' about the head of St Marks r. in the same neighborhood. (J. M.)

Vasisa.—Doc. of 1688 quoted by Gatschet, Creek Migr. Leg., i, 76, 1884 (Apalachee town). Wacissatalofa.—Bell in Morse, Rep. to Sec. War, 306, 1822 (Creek town).

Vasoreachic (vasoli, an herb; chic, 'place of'). A Tarahumare rancharia near Norogachic, Chihuahua, Mexico.—Lumholtz, inf'n, 1894.

Vawerachi (Va-we'-ra-chi, 'place of much water'). A small rancharia of the Tarahumare near Norogachic, Chihuahua, Mexico.—Lumholtz, inf'n, 1894.

Vaynorpa. A village of the Opata on the e. bank of Rio San Miguel, about lat. 30°, Sonora, Mexico.—Bandelier in Arch. Inst. Papers, iii, 71, 1890; iv, 487, 1892.

Vayuavabi. A ruined village of the Opata e. of Nacori, about lat. 29° 30', e. Sonora, Mexico.

Va-yua-va-bi.—Bandelier in Arch. Inst. Papers, iii, 62, 1890. Vay-ua-va-vi.—Ibid., iv, 508, 1892.

Vazacahel ('mesquite water'). A rancharia, probably Cochimi, connected with Purísima (Cadegomo) mission, Lower California, in the 18th century.

Vazacahel.—Doc. Hist. Mex., 4th s., v, 190, 1857. Vazacahel.—Ibid.

Vechaochi (V'e-cha'-o-chi, 'place of the prickly herb,' possibly referring to a cactus). A small rancharia of the Tarahumare near Norogachic, Chihuahua, Mexico.—Lumholtz, inf'n, 1894.

Vectaca. A village, presumably Costanoan, formerly connected with Dolores mission, San Francisco, Cal.—Taylor in Cal. Farmer, Oct. 18, 1861.

Velasco, Luis de. The brother of a chief of a Virginia district known to the Spaniards as Axacan (q. v.), on a stream flowing into Chesapeake bay. Spanish navigators, in company, perhaps, with some Dominican monks, had visited the country in 1559–60 and carried the boy to Mexico, where the viceroy, Don Luis de Velasco, caused him to be baptized and gave him his name. In 1566, while in Havana, Don Luis accompanied a party of 30 Spanish soldiers under a captain, and two Dominicans, to his home country, where it was planned to establish a mission; but the venture proving a failure, the monks and the Indian sailed for Spain. At court he so ingratiated himself into the good will of King Philip II that he lived at the royal expense during all his stay, when he returned to Havana with some Dominican missionaries who had embarked for Florida. The Florida mission having been abandoned, Don Luis, in his apparent zeal to convert his countrymen, joined the Jesuits under Father Segura on their departure for Florida in 1570. On August 5 Father Segura and 8 other Jesuits, together with the Indian, sailed for Chesapeake bay, reaching on Sept. 10 the province of Axacan, where they entered a river and landed. So impoverished was the country that the vessel was sent back with a message appealing for the relief of the destitution of the Indians in the following spring. On the departure of the vessel the fathers moved to another stream, 2 leagues distant, near a settlement governed by a younger brother of Don Luis, where a hut and a chapel were erected and where the Indian served as interpreter for some time, when he abandoned the missionaries under pretense of preparing for their reception at another village. Early in Feb. 1571, a messenger was sent by the missionaries to induce Don Luis to return. He received them with a great show of friendship and promised to return on the following day, but the same night the Indians, led by Luis, overtook the little party and murdered them. On Feb. 8, the remainder of the missionary band at their settlement were disarmed of their hatchets by a ruse, when the Indians fell upon and killed all except a little boy, Alonso, who was rescued by Menendez later in the year when he visited Axacan to wreak vengeance on the natives for the murders they had committed. Consult Lowery, Spanish Settlements—Florida, 1562–1574, 1905, and authorities therein cited; Murray, Lives Cath. Heroes, 1896; French, Hist. Coll. La., n. s., II, 230, 1875; Shea (1) in Beach, Ind. Venaambakala. A band or division of the Pomo, formerly living near the Russian settlement of Ross, in Sonoma co., Cal.—Powell in Cont. N. A. Ethnol., III, 493, 1877.

Venados (Span. pl. 'deer'). One of the tribes mentioned by Fray Bartolomé García as speaking the language of his Manual (1760). This tribe was either quite widely distributed or else the name was applied to several distinct bands, all evidently Coahuiltecan. In 1731 San Juan Capistrano mission was founded in Texas for the "Benados" and Toloujaá (Tiloja), and the Benado chief was made first "governor" of the mission (Test. de Asiento de Misiones, MS., 1731, in Gen. Land Off., Austin, Texas). In 1737 they deserted the mission (doc. in Lamar Papers, 1737, MS.). After 1757 large numbers of them were gathered at the Camargo mission, on the Rio Grande, and they were still living there as late as 1809 (Baptismal records in the parish church of Camargo, examined in 1907). Some time in the 18th century some of the tribe were at the Vizarron mission in northern Mexico (Portillo, Apuntes, 323, 1888). (H. E. B.)

Benados.—Test. de Asiento, 1731, op. cit.

Venango. A former Seneca settlement at the mouth of French cr., in Venango co., Pa., at the site of the present Franklin. According to the deposition of Stephen Coffen (1754) it was "called by the Indians Ganagarah'hare, on the Banks of Belle Rivière, where the River o Boeff empties into it" (Arch. Pa., 2d s., VI, 184, 1877). The place was later occupied by a mixed population of Seneca, Delawares, Shawnee, Wyandot, Ottawa, and other tribes allied with the French. The place first came into notice when the French agent Joncaire visited the Indians in 1753, in advance of the French expedition. He distributed presents to the Indians about the region, and expelled the English traders. John Fraser, who had been at the place for several years, selling goods and acting as a gunsmith, wrote to the Pennsylvania Council explaining that the French were building a fort "at Cascoago up French creek," the reference being to the French fort at Le Boeuf, now Waterford, Pa. No French fort was built at Cussewago. Many writers are in error in locating the French fort at this place, and in calling the locality where the French fort was built Cussewago. Shippen, in a letter concerning the matter, says: "Venango is the name of an Indian Town on Ohio, where Mr. Fraser has had a Gunsmith Shop for many years; it is situate eighty Miles up the same River beyond the Log's Town Casewago is Twenty miles above Weningo" (Col. Rec. Pa., v, 660, 1851). The entrance of the French expedition in 1753 caused great excitement among the Iroquois, who regarded it as an invasion of their lands; and also among the Delawares, Shawnee, and other Indians at Logstown for the same reason (see letter of Lieut. Holland, Col. Rec. Pa., v, 623; Letter of Gov. Dinwiddie, 630; Letter from Council of Onondaga, 637; Letter of Half King, 635; Weiser's Journal of his mission to Onondaga, 642-647). This expedition followed a different course from that of Céloron de Bienville (1749), which reached Allegheny r. by way of L. Chautauqua and Conewango r. It made the portage from Presqu' Isle (Erie, Pa.) to the headwaters of River au Bœuf (French cr.) and then down this stream to its mouth (Venango). Forts were built at the two former locations in 1753. It was the intention to build a third fort at Venango, but owing to the opposition of the Indians and the lateness of the season, this project was temporarily abandoned (Letter of M. Duquesne to M. de Rouille, Aug. 1753, in Arch. Pa., 2d s., vi, 161, 1877). Possession was taken of the place by Capt. Chalbert de Joncaire, who expelled the traders from John Fraser's house, and erected a French flag on the building, which he made his headquarters. He spent his time trying to win the Indians on the Ohio to the French interest. The presence of the French force within the region claimed by the English led to the mission of Washington and Gist, who were sent by the Governor of Virginia to warn the French invaders to depart (Washington's Jour., 1753; Gist's Jour., 1753; Frontier Forts, II, 1 et seq., 1895). The French fort at Venango was finished in the spring of 1754; it was called Ft Machault by the French, but was always called "the French fort at Venango" by the English. During the French occupancy of the Ohio this fort became a center of Indian influence on the upper Allegheny (Frontier Forts, II, 585, 1896). After the fall of Ft Duquesne in 1758, the fort at Venango was strengthened and a larger garrison placed at it; it then became a rendezvous for all the Indians hostile to the English. In the summer of 1759 there were about 1,000 Indians of various tribes gathered in the vicinity. Col. Hugh Mercer, the commander of Ft Pitt, wrote to Gov. Denny, telling him of the gathering of the French and Indians at Venango for the purpose of taking Ft Pitt (Col. Rec. Pa., VIII, 292, 1852). In the summer of 1759 the French force deserted all their posts in N. W. Pennsylvania, leaving the entire region in possession of the English (Col. Rec. Pa., VIII, 394-396, 1852). After the abandonment of Venango by the French a new fort was built by the English in the summer of 1760, which was called Ft Venango, but only a small garrison, under Lieut. Gordon, was stationed at the place. During the Pontiac war the little garrison and fort at Venango was blotted out by the hostile Seneca, not a soul escaping. Lieut. Gordon was slowly burned to death (Bouquet's letter, Col. Rec. Pa., IX, 35, 1852). All the frontier forts of W. Pennsylvania were besieged by the Indians at the same time, and all except Ft Ligonier and Ft Pitt fell under the fury of the Indians. After the destruction of Ft Venango the entire region in N. W. Pennsylvania was in full possession of the Indians (Parkman, Conspiracy of Pontiac, II, 18-25, 1901; Frontier Forts, II, 592, 1896; Arch. of Pa., 2d s., VI, 579 et seq., 1877). At the treaty of Ft Pitt in 1765 many Indian deputies were present from the upper Allegheny region (Col. Rec. Pa., IX, 250 et seq., 1852). The close of the Revolution brought fears of another Indian uprising in Pennsylvania. Settlements had been made at various points on the Allegheny N. of Kittanning, to protect which Ft Franklin was built, about half a mile up French cr. (Arch. of Pa., XI, 270, 1855). During the Indian troubles in 1794 this fort was strengthened. A garrison was kept at this point until 1796, when a new location was selected nearer the mouth of French cr. This building, called the "Old Garrison," was occupied until 1803, when, all danger of Indian invasion having passed away, the military post was abandoned. (G. P. D.)

Vesnacks.—Bancroft, Nat. Races, I, 450, 1874.

Vesperic Indians. A term proposed by Schoolcraft (Ind. Tribes, II, 28, 1852; V, 104, 1855; VI, 35, 1857) to designate the entire group of tribes geographically limited to the exact area of the United States.

Vessels. See Pottery, Receptacles.

Viayan. A Coahuiltecan band mentioned in 1754, with the Piguiques, as a subtribe of the Pamaques, q. v. (Informe, in Mem. de Nueva España, XXVII, 307, MS.). They are listed by Morfi as a Texas tribe (Mem. Hist. Tex., bk. II, ca. 1782).

Vicháráchi ('where there are needles,' referring to cactus spines). A small rancheria of the Tarahumare near Norogachic, Chihuahua, Mexico.—Lumholtz, inf'n, 1894.

Viddaquimamar. A tribe or band, perhaps Coahuiltecan, which lived during the first decade of the 18th century at San Francisco Solano mission, s. of the Rio Grande and below the site of Eagle Pass, Texas. They were closely associated with the Terocodame and Tunamar (Ticmamar) bands (Baptismal records of the mission, MS.).

Biddaquimamar.—Baptismal rec., 1707, op. cit.

Viger. A Malecite settlement in Viger township, Temiscouata co., Quebec, containing 106 inhabitants in 1910.

Vihiyo (Víhiyo, 'chiefs,' sing. viy). The name used to designate the tribal council of 44 chiefs of the Cheyenne (q. v.); sometimes regarded, but improperly, as constituting a regular warrior society of the tribe. (J. M.)

Vi-qit.—Hoffman, MS., B. A. E., 1882.

Village, Village site. See Mounds, Pueblos, Shell-heaps.

Village du Puant. A former village, probably of the Winnebago, on Wild Cat cr., about a mile above its junction with the Wabash, above Lafayette, in Tippecanoe co., Ind. It was abandoned before 1819. The site was included in the "Langlois reserve." See St. Mary's Treaty (1819) in U. S. Ind. Treat., 493, 1873.

Venizali.—Hallock in Nat. Geog. Mag., IX, 91, 1898. Vinisahle.—11th Census, Alaska, 164, 1893.

Vinatacot.—Taylor in Cal. Farmer, Jan. 24, 1862.

Vintacottas.—Taylor in Browne, Res. Pac. Slope, app., 53, 54, 1869 (wrongly identified with the Uchities).

Viní. Mentioned as a New Mexico mission in 1742.—Mendoza et al. (1742–3) quoted by Bancroft, Ariz. and N. Mex., 244, 1889.

Visions. See Dreams, Oyaron.

Vossnessenski. An Aleut village and trading post on the island of that name in the Shumagin group, Alaska. Pop. 22 in 1880; 43 in 1890.

Vossnessensky.—Petroff in 10th Census, Alaska, 23, 1884. Vornesensky.—11th Census, Alaska, 86, 1893.

Vuikhtulik. A Nushagagmiut Eskimo village on the n. shore of L. Alaknakik, Alaska; pop. 51 in 1880.

Vuikhtuligmute.—Petroff, Rep. on Alaska, 50, 1880 (miut = 'people').

Vumahein. Mentioned as a pueblo of the province of Atriquy (q. v.), in the region of the lower Rio Grande, New Mexico, in 1598.—Oñate (1598) in Doc. Inéd., XVI, 115, 1871.

Vuntakutchin (Vun-tta-kwi-chin, 'people of Willow creek,' referring to Charlie's cr., where willows abound.—Schmitter). A Kutchin tribe, now greatly modified by contact with whites, occupying the country n. of Porcupine r., Alaska, as far as the Eskimo territory on the Arctic coast. They trade at Ft Yukon and at Ft Egbert in common with the western Kutchin. They formerly traded at Ft Selkirk, Pelly Banks, and Francis lake, but abandoned their trips on the destruction of the trading-posts at these points.

The Vuntakutchin subsist entirely by hunting and fishing, agriculture being unknown to them, although their territory is fertile. During the winter they move about wherever game is plentiful; in the spring they go to the river, where they make canoes and nets in preparation for salmon fishing, and during the summer dry and cache large quantities of fish; in the fall the entire family goes hunting, and when a good supply of game is accumulated it is cached on the spot; later, in October, they return to the river for about two months, when they make snowshoes, toboggans, and other articles for winter use. Wolfish dogs, their only domestic animals, are employed in winter for drawing toboggans and sleds, and in summer for hauling boats up the river banks. For inland travel, when there is no snow, the dogs are used as pack-animals. Each man owns a team of about five dogs.

The habitations formerly consisted of tents of caribou skin, supported by poles which were left behind when the occupants moved. Most of the people now live in rude, ill-ventilated cabins of a single room, built of logs chinked with moss, and with roofs of saplings covered with turf.

The native costume consisted of a parka of caribou skin—a hooded coat reaching to the knees, put on over the head. Sometimes sealskin parkas were obtained in trade from the natives of the lower river. Trousers, or a combination of trousers and stockings, of dressed moose-skin were also worn, as likewise were mittens and moccasins of the same material, cut in generous size in order that they could be lined with grass during cold weather. The coat of a chief was ornamented with quillwork, front and back, and had a special collar of moose-skin, fringed and quilled, which was significant of his office. A special hunting belt of caribou skin, quill-worked, was provided; from it hung an ornamented moose-skin knife-sheath. Most of the native clothing has been supplanted by the cast-off clothing of the whites, or by cheap fabrics introduced by traders. Garments were decorated with porcupine quills dyed red by boiling in cranberry juice, or blue by boiling in huckleberry juice; pure white quills were not dyed; various colored flowers were also boiled and their coloring matter used for dyeing quills. Small geometrical figures were made by sewing the flattened-out quills to a backing of skin, and long stripes were made by rolling the quills into narrow spirals and sewing them side by side. The hair was formerly allowed to grow long, tied in a bunch behind, with a small knot over each temple. Swan feathers were chopped fine and applied with grease to the rear bunch daily until it became a large mass. Rings of small bird bones were worn in the nasal septum, especially on gala occasions. The older people still have their noses pierced.

Skin-dressing is the work of women. The hide is soaked in water to soften it, and the hair is scraped off with the end of a sharp bone spatula. All sewing is still done with bone awls. The women also make beadwork for sale to whites.

Moose-skin mittens are likewise made for the white trade.

Formerly a healthy people, the Vuntakutchin, like the other Kutchin tribes, have suffered greatly by the inroads of disease since their contact with whites and the adoption of some of the habits and devices of frontier civilization, and especially the change in their dwellings. Tuberculosis is the most deadly enemy with which they have to cope, very few of them being free from it. Tonsillitis, respiratory diseases and digestive diseases, and myalgia are ever present. Diphtheria carries off many in occasional epidemics.

The diet of the Vuntakutchin consists chiefly of fish, game, and berries. Their principal game animals are caribou, moose, bear, and mountain sheep. The fish is chiefly salmon. Various berries and a large tuber form their chief vegetal food. Ravens, hawks, eagles, dogs, and wolves are not eaten. They seldom eat wolverene, though lynx and one kind of owl are consumed. Salmon (they prefer the dog salmon) are caught in hand-nets, but fish-wheels are gradually replacing the primitive method. Whitefish and grayling are regarded as luxuries. Fish are dressed by the women, and dried on racks until ready for caching. Caribou are run between two long rail fences converging into a corral, snares are placed at intervals, and the caribou that try to escape are shot with arrows. Moose are stalked and shot with arrows; sometimes, in spring, they are snared in creeks, into which they are driven with the aid of dogs and are then dispatched with pikes. Bears are deceived by the natives who imitate the cry of a raven when it has discovered a dead moose; the Indian, armed with a spear, then kills the bear at close range. Birds and other small game are killed with blunt-pointed arrows.

Baskets for cooking are made of spruce roots; these are watertight when soaked, and water is boiled in them by means of hot stones. Birchbark utensils are also made, but chiefly for use on the hunt. Fire was made with flint and iron pyrites, a fungus furnishing the tinder; the fire-drill was also used. Stone hammers fastened to wooden handles with strips of caribou skin are still employed for breaking bones. Stone hatchets were used until recent years. Hunting knives are of bone, ground flat and sharpened on both edges, and sometimes copper knives are obtained in trade from White r. The spear was made by binding a hunting knife of caribou-horn to the end of a pole 6 ft long. Bows and arrowshafts, as well as fish-net, snowshoe, toboggan, and canoe frames, are made of birch; their wooden objects are nearly always painted with red ocher, which is used also as a face paint. Babiche of walrus-hide, obtained in trade with down-stream natives, is used for netting snowshoes, fish-nets, and the like.

The tribe was governed by a chief whose authority is said to have been despotic; he detailed hunting parties and dictated their duties, and had sole power to apportion the product of the hunt. During the absence or incapacity of a chief, a patriarchal form of government exists, important matters being decided by the elders in council. Public opinion has great weight in controlling the chief's personal actions. Sometimes the Vunta-kutchin intermarry with other tribes, and sometimes outside children are adopted into a family. Couples were often betrothed in marriage while children, the arrangement of course being made by their parents, although the engaged couple had a voice in the question of the final marriage. When between 10 and 15 years the boy went to live with the parents of the girl, but they were not married until the boy was able to support a wife. On the death of a wife or a husband it was not customary for the survivor to remarry for several years.

Ceremonial tribal feasts are given on various occasions, such as at the birth of a child, when the eldest son kills his first game, or when a girl reaches puberty. In the last instance the girl, after the feast, goes about a mile from home, where she lives in isolation for a year under the care of a relative of her betrothed. During this period fresh meat is tabooed, otherwise game would become scarce during the ensuing year. The body of a deceased chief was burned by men employed for the purpose; the burned bones and ashes were then placed in a wooden receptacle and hung in a tree. The men who burned the body ate no fresh meat for a year, else, it was believed, they too would die. It is said that a belief is current among them to the effect that when a person dies his spirit returns to a woman and is reborn. Property is not inherited by relatives on the death of a chief, but is distributed to visitors at a potlatch which lasts several days, or until the supplies are exhausted, and to which members of related tribes are invited.

As among many tribes the medicine-men perform their functions by dreams, incantation, and magic, whether it is desired to heal the sick, to overcome the enemy, or to make a hunt successful. The power supposed to be possessed by a medicine-man to promote the tribal welfare is believed also to be employed sometimes in the malevolent practice of sorcery.

Richardson (Arct. Exped., 397, 1851) gave their population in 1817 as 80 men; in 1866 they numbered 60 men, of whom about 25 were hunters. Their present population is not known.

Waban ('east'). A "Praying Indian" of the Nipmuc tribe, born at Musketaquid, the site of Concord, Mass., about 1604; died late in 1676 or early in 1677. His later home was 4 or 5 m. from Roxbury, on the S. side of Charles r., near Watertown mill, now in Newton township, at a place where John Eliot in 1646 established his first mission and which he named Nonantum, signifying 'I rejoice.' When John Eliot first visited the place in 1646 he was welcomed by Waban, who ever after encouraged the missionary in his labors and manifested sincere friendship toward the whites. He is said to have been the first Massachusetts chief to profess Christianity. In 1651 the mission of Natick was established, and Waban and his people removed thereto. In 1674 he was the chief man of the latter place, which then contained 29 families, and is described by Gookin as "a person of great prudence and piety: I do not know of any Indian that excels him." When in 1676 a civil community was established there Waban was made a "ruler of fifty," and subsequently a justice of the peace. While serving in this capacity, it is said that he was asked by a young justice what he would do when Indians got drunk and quarreled. Waban replied, "Tie um all up, and whip um plaintiff, and whip um 'fendent, and whip um witness." He married the eldest daughter of Tahattawan, or Attawan, sachem of Musketaquid. In Apr. 1675, about two months before King Philip's war, Waban visited one of the magistrates for the purpose of informing him of the impending outbreak of the Indians, and in the following month he repeated the warning, stating that Philip's men "were only waiting for the trees to get leaved out that they might prosecute their designs with more effect." He appears to have been sent to Deer island with other prisoners in Oct. 1675, many of whom had been falsely accused, and was one of the ill who were returned in May of the following year. Waban's name is conspicuous on the Eliot memorial, erected about 1879 at the head of the valley between the hills Nonantum and Waban, at Newton.

Wabanaquot ('White Cloud'). A Chippewa chief, son of Wabojeeg, born at Gull Lake, Minn., 11 m. from the present Brainerd, about 1830. He was not of an old hereditary line, his father having been appointed chief by the United States agent solely on account of his amiability. On his father's death he succeeded to the office, and was generally considered principal chief of the Mississippi bands of Chippewa. In 1868 he removed with his band and many others to White Earth res., where he lived until his death in 1898. He was considered a fine speaker by his tribesmen, but was not a man of sterling principle, having come under the influence of a malicious half-breed trader who kept him supplied with whisky, and in return induced Wabanaquot to further his nefarious designs, to the detriment of his people (see Wendjimadub). In particular the trader led Wabanaquot to bitterly fight three excellent agents who were doing much good for the Indians. This hostility covered about 10 years. White Cloud became a Christian about 1871; but his drinking and other vices prevented him from doing honor to his professed belief. A monument was erected over his grave by the state, the only Indian in Minnesota thus honored, but this is regarded as having been due to political machinations rather than to Wabanaquot's worth. (J. A. G.)

Wabash. In 1682 La Salle mentioned the Ouabachi as one of the tribes defeated by the Iroquois a few years previously. It is impossible to determine whether it was really the name of a tribe or only a collective term for the Indians living on Wabash r. in Indiana and Illinois. In the 18th century the Wea, Piankashaw, Eel River Miami, and perhaps also the Kickapoo, were commonly known as the Wabash confederates. The name, according to J. P. Dunn, is an abbreviation of the Miami name for the stream, Wa-ba-shī'-kī, or Wa-pa-shī'-kī, meaning 'bright white,' or 'gleaming white,' and referring to the limestone bed of the stream in its upper course.

Wabokieshiek ('The Light,' or 'White Cloud'). A medicine-man, also known as The Prophet, the friend and adviser of Black Hawk. He was born about 1794, and presided over a village known as "Prophet's Village," on Rock r., about 35 m. above its mouth, on the site of the present Prophetstown, Ill. Half Winnebago and half Sauk, he had great influence with both tribes, and was noted for cruelty and his hostility toward Americans. When Black Hawk's lieutenant, Neapope, went to Malden, Canada, to consult with the British authorities in regard to the right of the Indians to retain their lands on Rock r., he stopped on his return at the Prophet's village, where he remained during the winter, and told Wabokieshiek of his mission. The Prophet, always ready for mischief and delighted at this opportunity to make trouble for the whites, is said to have performed some incantations, had several visions, and prophesied that if Black Hawk would move against the whites he would be joined by the "Great Spirit" and a large army which would enable him to overcome the whites and regain possession of his old village. These predictions, added to Neapope's false reports from the British, induced Black Hawk to continue the war which bears his name. Keokuk is said to have blamed the Prophet for all the trouble. After the defeat of the Indians at Bad Axe in 1832, Black Hawk and the Prophet made their escape, but were captured by Chaetar and One-Eyed Dekaury, two Winnebago Indians, in an attempt to reach Prairie La Crosse, where they expected to cross the Mississippi and be safe. They were delivered to Gen. Street on Aug. 27, 1832. Arriving at Jefferson Barracks, 10 m. below St. Louis, they were put in irons, to their extreme mortification and of which they complained bitterly. In April of the following year they were taken to Washington, where they were permitted to see President Jackson, to whom Wabokieshiek appealed for their freedom; instead, they were sent to Fortress Monroe, Va., where they remained until June 4, when they were released. Having lost his prestige as a prophet, Wabokieshiek lived in obscurity among the Sauk in Iowa until their removal to Kansas, and died among the Winnebago about 1841. He is described as being six ft tall, stout and athletic of figure, with a countenance in keeping with his militant disposition. At variance with accounts of his depravity is a statement by Maj. Thomas Forsythe, for years the agent of the Sauk and Foxes, in which he says of Wabokieshiek: "Many a good meal has the Prophet given to the people traveling past his village, and very many stray horses has he recovered from the Indians and restored them to their rightful owners, without asking any recompense whatever." It is also said that during the progress of the Black Hawk war, Col. Gratiot, agent for the Winnebago, who on account of his humane and honorable treatment of the Indians was considered most likely to influence them, was selected to visit the hostile camp and induce the Prophet to turn the British band back to its Iowa reservation. On reaching the Prophet's village, Gratiot and his party were surrounded by the hostiles and made prisoners, despite their flag of truce, and he would have lost his life had not the Prophet come to his rescue. He was taken to Wabokieshiek's house and allowed to explain the object of his mission, but could not dissuade the Indians from their purpose. Although the warriors clamored for Gratiot's life, Wabokieshiek was determined to save him, and after keeping him for several days found an opportunity to allow him to escape.

While in Jefferson Barracks Wabokieshiek's portrait was painted by Catlin, and is now in the National Museum; another portrait, by R. M. Sully, made while the Prophet was a prisoner at Fortress Monroe, is here reproduced.

Waccamaw. One of the small tribes formerly dwelling on the Lower Pedee and its branches in South Carolina and the adjacent border of North Carolina. Nothing is known of their language, and very little else concerning them, as they were never prominent in history. Their associations indicate that they were Siouan. Their habitat was along Waccamaw r., which enters the Pedee from the n. almost at its mouth. They were mentioned first in 1715 as living near the Winyaw, both tribes receiving ammunition from the Cheraw, who attempted to gain them as allies of the Yamasee and other tribes against the English. At this time they were living in 6 villages with a population of 610 (Rivers, Hist. S. Car., 94, 1874). In 1755 the Cherokee and Notchee were reported to have killed some Pedee and Waccamaw in the white settlements (Gregg, Hist. of Old Cheraws, 15, 1867). Like the Pedee, Cheraw, and other tribes of that region (Mooney, Siouan Tribes of the East, 76, 1894), the remnant was probably finally incorporated with the Catawba.

Waco. One of the divisions of the Tawakoni, whose village stood until after 1830 on the site of the present city of Waco, Texas. The name does not seem unmistakably to appear until after 1820, occurring first in Anglo-American accounts. As the Tawakoni evidently are the Touacara, whom La Harpe visited in 1719 on Canadian r., it is not impossible (and it has been assumed) that the Honecha, or Houecha, given by La Harpe and Beaurain as one of the Touacara group, are identical with the Waco.

Yet, if the later Waco had kept this name throughout the 18th century, it is strange that it should not appear in some of the many Spanish reports and descriptions of them under the name Tawakoni, after 1770. It has been thought that the Quainco of De l'Isle's map are the same as the Waco.

That the Waco village of the 19th century was identical with one or the other of the two neighboring Tawakoni villages on the Brazos, known in the later 18th century respectively as the village of El Quiscat and that of the Flechazos, is clear, though it is not easy to determine which one, since both were in the immediate neighborhood of Waco. As the ethnology, customs, and early history of these two villages are quite fully given under Tawakoni, they need not be described here.

About 1824, according to Stephen F. Austin, the main Waco village consisted of 33 grass houses, occupying about 40 acres, and inhabited by about 100 men. Half a mile below was another village of 15 houses, built close together. The Waco were then cultivating about 200 acres of corn, enclosed with brush fences ("Description of Waco Villages," n. d., in Austin Papers, Class D). At the site of the Waco village a native earthwork, like that of their kindred, the Taovayas (Tawehash), and known to have been used for military purposes as late as 1829, is said to have been until very recently still visible at the city of Waco (Kenney in Wooten, Comp. His. Tex., i, 745, 1898). For the relations of the tribe with the Anglo-American Texans, see Kenney, op. cit.

The Waco were included in the treaties made between the United States and the Wichita in 1835 and 1846, and also in 1872, when their reservation in the present Oklahoma was established. In 1902 they received allotments of land and became citizens. (B. A. E.)

Waddington Harbour.—Can. Ind. Aff., 277, 1894. Wadington Harbor.—Ibid., 189, 1893.

Wadjahonak ('those who seek a living'). The name given by the Algonkin of Oka (q. v.) to the Iroquois women of the same settlement on account of their custom of peddling their manufactures to the neighboring whites, a thing which the Algonkin women of Oka never do.—Cuoq, Lexique Algonquien, 416, 1886.

Wafford, James D. (Tsuskwānāñ'nd-wa'tā, 'Worn-out blanket'). A Western Cherokee mixed-blood, speaking and writing both languages, born in the old Cherokee Nation near the site of the present Clarkesville, Ga., in 1806, and dying when about 90 years of age at his home in the E. part of the Cherokee Nation, adjoining the Seneca res., in the present Oklahoma. The name figures prominently in the early history of North Carolina and Georgia. His grandfather, Colonel Wafford, was an officer in the American Revolutionary army, and shortly after the treaty of Hopewell, in 1785, established a colony known as "Wafford settlement," in upper Georgia, on territory which was afterward found to be within the Indian boundary and was acquired by special treaty purchase in 1804. His name is appended, as witness for the State of Georgia, to the treaty of Holston, in 1794. On his mother's side Wafford was of mixed Cherokee, Natchez, and white blood, she being a cousin of Sequoya (q. v.). He was also remotely connected with Cornelius Dougherty, the first trader established among the Cherokee. In the course of his long life he filled many positions of trust and honor among his people. In his youth he attended the mission school at Valletown under Rev. Evan Jones, and just before the adoption of the Cherokee alphabet he finished the translation into phonetic Cherokee spelling of a Sunday-school speller. In 1824 he was the census enumerator for that district of the Cherokee Nation embracing upper Hiwassee r., in North Carolina, with Nottely and Toccoa in the adjoining portion of Georgia. His fund of Cherokee geographic information thus acquired was found to be invaluable. He was one of the two commanders of the largest detachment of emigrants at the time of the removal, and his name appears as a councilor for the Western Cherokee in the Cherokee Almanac for 1846. When employed for the Bureau of American Ethnology by Mr Mooney, at Tahlequah, in 1891, his mind was still clear and his memory keen. Being of practical bent, he was concerned chiefly with tribal history, geography, linguistics, and every-day life and customs, on all of which subjects his knowledge was exact and detailed, but there were few myths for which he was not able to furnish confirmatory testimony. Despite his education he was a firm believer in the Nūñē'hī, or fairies, and several of the best legends connected with them were obtained from him. His death took from the Cherokee one of the last connecting links between the present and the past. (J. M.)

Waganakisi ('bent tree,' from a tree on a neighboring hill). A former Ottawa village on the site of Harbor Springs, Emmet co., Mich. It was one of the oldest and most important Ottawa settlements in Michigan, having been established about 1743, after the expulsion of the Mascoutens from the district. In 1825 the Catholic mission of St Vincent de Paul was established there.

Wah-he.—Lee and Frost, Oregon, 176, 1844.

Wahi's Band. A Paviotso band under Wahi (Fox), formerly at the big bend of Carson r., w. Nev.; said to number 130 in 1859.—Dodge in Ind. Aff. Rep. 1859, 374, 1860.

Wahkiakum. A Chinookan tribe formerly living on the n. bank of Columbia r. near its mouth. Their territory adjoined that of the Chinook and extended upstream toward Oak point. According to Stuart (1821) they were an offshoot of the Chinook who had separated from the main body about two generations before under chief Wahkiacum and were afterward known by his name. In 1805 Lewis and Clark estimated their number at 200. They have been lost sight of as a tribe since about 1850, when Gibbs referred to their chief as almost the last survivor of the tribe. Their principal village seems to have been near Pillar rock, a short distance above Grays bay. According to Boas they had two villages near Pillar rock—Tlalegak, a little below the rock, and Chakwayalham farther down the river. (L. F.)

Wahoma. A former Luisefio village in San Diego co., s. Cal.—Hayes (1850) quoted by Bancroft, Nat. Races, i, 460, 1886.

Wahoo. A Georgia and South Carolina name for Ulmus alata, the cork or winged elm, but for many years applied to the species of elm indiscriminately. The bark of the cork elm, which is pliable, has been used for making ropes and cord, hence the name Lynn wahoo, where "Lynn" is miswritten for lin or lind (Tilia). (2) Tilia heterophylla, from the resemblance of its wood to that of the cork elm. A variant of the name is whahoo. The name is from ûhawhu, in the Creek language. (W. R. G.)

Wahoo. A name for Euonymus purpureus, the spindle-bush, burning bush, or Indian arrowwood; spelled also whahoo, waahoo, and wahoon. The word is from Dakota wa'hu, 'arrowwood' (fide the late Rev. J. O. Dorsey). (W. R. G.)

Wahowah. See Hopehood.

Wahowpum (from hâhâu, a species of willow; pûm, 'people': 'willow people'). A small Shahaptian tribe, speaking the Tenino language, formerly living on the n. side of Columbia r., near the mouth of Olive cr., in Klickitat co., Wash. They are mentioned by Lewis and Clark, who evidently used the term to include a large number of Klickitat bands.

Hâhau'pûm.—Mooney in 14th Rep. B. A. E., 739, 1896 ('willow people': native name). Wah-howpum.—Schoolcraft, Ind. Tribes, v, 706, 1855. Wahowpum.—Lewis and Clark Exped., ii, 472, 1814. Wahupums.—Wilkes, Hist. Oregon, 44, 1845.

Wahpekute (wahpe, leaf; kute, to shoot: 'shooters in the leaves'). One of the 7 primary divisions of the Dakota. Although the name Santee was originally applied only to the Mdewakanton, it was early extended to the Wahpekute, so closely were the two tribes connected, and eventually by the Teton also to the two other tribes of the eastern Dakota. Historic and linguistic evidence proves the close affinity of the tribes of this group. The Wahpekute were doubtless living in the vicinity of the Mdewakanton of Mille Lac, Minn., when first visited by the French (1678–1680), and were still so closely combined with them as to be included under the one term. In 1766 Carver met the Wahpekute somewhere on Minnesota r. They were in 1804, according to Lewis and Clark, on both sides of that stream below Redwood r., and numbered about 150 men. Pike (1806) spoke of them as the smallest band of the Sioux, residing generally between Mississippi and Missouri rs., and hunting commonly at the head of Des Moines r. He characterizes them as "the most stupid and inactive of all the Sioux." Long (Exped. St. Peter's R., 1, 386, 1824) says. "This tribe has a very bad name, being considered to be a lawless set of men. They have a regular hereditary chief, Wiahuga ('the raven'), who is acknowledged as such by the Indian agent, but who, disgusted by their misbehaviour, withdrew from them and resides at Wapasha's.

They have no fixed villages, they inhabit skin lodges, and rove at the head of Cannon and Blue Earth r. Their hunting grounds are in that vicinity and west of it." He estimated them at 100 lodges, 200 warriors, and 800 souls. According to Sibley (Minn. Hist. Coll., III, 250, 1880) they were in 1834 in villages on Cannon r., a short distance from the present city of Faribault, Minn., and at a few other points. They numbered then about 150 warriors. Between 1842 and 1857 they were under two chiefs named Wamdiapa (Black Eagle) and Tassgi. The lawless and predatory habits of Wamdiapa and his band prolonged the war with the Sauk and Foxes in which they had been engaged, and created difficulties between them and the rest of the Wahpekute which caused a separation. Wamdiapa and his band went w. and occupied lands about Vermillion r., S. Dak. So thoroughly were they separated from the rest of the Wahpekute that when the latter, together with the Mdewakanton, made a treaty at Mendota in 1851 ceding their lands in Minnesota, the remnant of Wamdiapa's band was not regarded as being a part of the tribe and did not participate in the treaty. In 1857 all that remained of this straggling band were some 10 or 15 lodges under Inkpaduta (q. v.). It was this remnant that committed the massacre in 1857 about Spirit lake and Springfield, Minn. (Flandreau in Minn. Hist. Coll., III, 387, 1880). In 1856, according to the Report on Indian Affairs for that year, the Mdewakanton and Wahpekute together numbered 2,379. A part at least of the tribe participated in the massacre of 1862. They are now with the Mdewakanton on the Santee res., Nebr.

Wahpeton (wahpé, 'leaf'; tonuron (French nasal n), 'a village'; hence probably 'dwellers among leaves'). One of the 7 primary divisions of the Dakota. Historic and linguistic evidence proves the affinity of this tribe with the Sisseton, Wahpekute, and Mdewakanton. Hennepin (1680) mentions them as living in the vicinity of Mille Lac, Minn., near the Mdewakanton, Sisseton, and Teton. On his map they are placed a little to the n. e. of the lake. Le Sueur (1700) places the Oudebatons, or "river village," among the eastern Sioux, and the Orapontons, "village of the leaf," among the Sioux of the west. As both these names seem to be forms of Wahpeton, it is probable that they are applied to different villages of the tribe, which was subsequently found most of the time in two bands. It was not until Lewis and Clark and Pike visited the N. W. that the name appeared again in history. According to the former (1804) they resided on Minnesota r., just above its mouth, and claimed the country to the mouth of Chippeway r., thence n. e. to Crow Wing r. Pike (1806) says: "They hunt on the St. Peter's [Minnesota r.], also on the Mississippi, up Rum r., and sometimes follow the buffalo on the plains."

They gradually moved up Minnesota r., so that in 1849 they lived n. and w. of the Wahpekute, their villages extending far upstream toward its source. They had one of their most important villages in the vicinity of Lac qui Parle. Here missionaries established themselves as early as 1835, at which date the tribe numbered about 1,500 persons. According to Sibley (Minn. Hist. Coll., III, 250, 1880) the lower Wahpeton were found on Minnesota r., not far from Belle-plaine; the upper Wahpeton villages were on the shores of Lac qui Parle. They were ultimately gathered with the Sisseton on L. Traverse res. The estimates of population vary from 900 to 1,500. In 1909 the Sisseton and Wahpeton together, under the Sisseton agency, S. Dak., were reported as numbering 1,936. They were participants in the Minnesota outbreak and massacre of 1862.

According to Long (Exped. St. Peter's R., I, 367, 1824) these Indians were good-looking and straight; none were large, nor were any remarkable for the symmetry of their forms. They were, for the greater part, destitute of clothing, except the breechcloth, though some of the young men were dressed with care and ostentation. "They wore looking-glasses suspended from their garments. Others had papers of pins, purchased from the traders, as ornaments. We observed that one, who appeared to be a man of some note among them, had a live sparrow hawk on his head, by way of distinction; this man wore also a buffalo robe, on which 8 bear tracks were painted. . . . The squaws we saw had no ornament, nor did they seem to value themselves upon their personal appearance. . . . Both males and females have small feet and hands. . . . The dress of the women consisted of a long wrapper, with short sleeves, of dark calico; this covered them from the shoulders to the waist; a piece of blue broadcloth, wound two or three times round the waist, its end tucked in, extended to the knee. They also wore leggings of blue or scarlet cloth. Their forms were rather clumsy; their waists not very delicate, they exhibited a great breadth of hips, and their motions were not graceful." The village consisted of skin lodges, yet they cultivated maize to some extent. According to Pike the tribe devoted a considerable portion of the year to pursuit of the buffalo.

Lewis and Clark mention two divisions, the Wakpaatonwan and Otechiatonwan. Parker (Minn. Handbk., 140, 1857), adds the Inyanchevakaatonwan and Inkpa. Ashley (15th Rep. B. A. E., 216, 1897, and letters) enumerates the following bands: Inyanchevakaatonwan, Takapintonwanna, Wiyakaotina, Otechiatonwan, Witautina, Wakpaatonwan, Chankaghotina, Inkpa, Mdeiyedan, and Inyangmani. Waddapawjestin and the village of Wahnaesoutah can not be identified with any of these.

Wailatpuan Family (from Wayiletpu, pl. of Wa-ilet, '[one] Cayuse man.'—Gatschet). A linguistic family composed of two divisions: the Cayuse and the Molala, the former occupying the territory from Des Chutes r. to the Blue mts., including the headwaters of Wallawalla, Grande Ronde, and Umatilla rs., in Oregon and Washington. The territory of the Molala is not so certain, but was probably for the greater part in the Cascade range between Mts Hood and Scott, and on Molala cr. in W. Oregon. The Wailatpuan language has not yet been thoroughly studied, and, while classed as independent, may prove to be related to the Shahaptian, with the tribes of which family the Cayuse have always been closely associated. According to Gatschet the two dialects of the language are very distinct, which would indicate a geographical separation of the two tribes of long standing. There is, however, a tradition among the Cayuse of the western migration of the Molala which would support a contrary view. The tribes of the family have probably always been weak in numbers, and, although constantly decreasing in historic times, have been noted for warlike qualities. Both branches are now nearly extinct. (L. F.)

Wailaki (Wintun: 'northern language'). An Athapascan tribe or group of many villages formerly on the main Eel r. and its N. fork from Kekawaka cr. to within a few miles of Round valley, Cal. After some fighting with the whites they were placed on Round valley res., where a few of them still reside. Their houses were circular. They had no canoes, but crossed streams by weighting themselves down with stones while they waded. They lived by the river during the wet months of the year, when their chief occupation was fishing, done at especially favorable places by means of nets and spears. The summer and fall months were spent on the sides and tops of the ridges, where the women were able to gather the bulbs, seeds, and nuts, and the men could unite in deer drives and other methods of hunting. They usually buried their dead, but burned those who fell in battle. They took the whole heads of their enemies as trophies, with which they were accustomed to dance. Like the Yuki the women have their noses and cheeks as well as their chins tattooed. Coyote holds the principal place in their mythology, where he is represented as acting under the direction of his father. He secured for men daylight and the heavenly bodies, and fire which he succeeded in stealing from their guardians. He established the fishing places, and ordained social and other customs. An adolescent ceremony was held for the girls, and most of the boys were trained with the candidates for medicine-men, who were restricted as to their food, drink, and sleep for many days. This training took place in the fall under the direction of two or more old shamans. Public exhibitions, consisting in part of dancing, were given by the candidates. Large conical dance houses were erected occasionally, and dedicated with ceremonies of dancing and singing; such were important occasions of mingled social and religious character. (P. E. G.)

Wakanasisi (Wä'k'anasi'si). A locality on the N. side of Columbia r., Wash., nearly opposite the mouth of the Willamette; also the name of the Chinookan tribe, strictly called Galakanasisi (Gä'l'ak'anasisi, 'those of the woodpecker'), formerly living at that point and in its vicinity. Before moving to this place they lived at Lakstak, on the S. side of the Columbia, a little below Nakoak, and were then called Gatqstax (Boas). About 1840 their chief was Kiesno, whose name is sometimes given to their main village. After the epidemic of 1829 the Wakanasisi were greatly reduced in numbers and included the remnants of several neighboring tribes. In 1849 they numbered fewer than 100, and are now extinct. (L. F.)

bia between lat. 54° and $50^{\circ} 30'$, the n. and w. parts of Vancouver id., and the extreme n. w. corner of Washington, nearly to lat. 48° n. The name is derived from waukash, 'good,' which Cook heard at Friendly cove, Nootka sd., and supposed to be the name of a tribe. The culture of these people is almost identical with that of the coast Salish to the s. and e. of them, and with that of the Tsimshian, Haida, and Tlingit in the n. In physical characteristics they rather approach the coast Salish, and their language conforms in type most closely with that of the Salish and Chimakuan. Juan de Fuca probably reached the coast of British Columbia and was the first white man to see the lands of the Wakashan. If Fuentes be not an imaginary person, nor his voyage a fable, he sailed in 1640 through the archipelago where the Wakashan live. Ensign Juan Perez is believed to have anchored in Nootka sd. in 1774. In the following year Bodega and Maurelle passed along the Wakashan coast on their way s. In 1786 English vessels under Capts. Hanna, Portlock, and Dixon called at this coast, and from that time visits of British and American trading vessels were constant, Nootka in particular being much frequented. Between 1792 and 1794 Capt. George Vancouver visited the country. In 1803 the Boston, of Boston Mass., was destroyed by the people of Nootka, and all on board except two persons were killed. From the account of one of these, John R. Jewitt, we have important information regarding the tribes of the w. coast of Vancouver id. The Hudson's Bay Co. established a post at Victoria in 1843, and from that time relations with the natives became more intimate. Since then the native population has pretty steadily declined. Mission stations have been established at many points with considerable success in the n., but half of the southern Kwakiutl still hold to their ancient customs and beliefs. Most of the Nootka have been converted by Roman Catholic missionaries. Wakashan dwellings were large structures of huge cedar beams and planks, and stood in a row fronting the sea. Each accommodated several families which had separate fires. The canoe was one of the essentials of existence on these shores, where there were no better seamen than the tribes of the w. coast of Vancouver id. These and a few of the neighboring tribes in Washington were the only people who pursued and killed the whale, others being content to wait until the animals drifted ashore dead. For the rest of their diet they depended mainly upon fish, but they also hunted land and sea animals and collected shellfish, roots, and berries, each family owning its own fishing grounds and salmon creeks, which it guarded jealously. Although good carvers of wood, they were excelled in this respect by the Haida and Tlingit. The northern tribes, the Heiltsuk Kwakiutl, reckoned descent in the female line; but the southern tribes, though in a transitional state, are rather to be reckoned in the paternal stage. Intertribal warfare was constant and slavery an institution. Head flattening was practised considerably by the tribes of Vancouver id. The potlatch was one of the cardinal institutions, and around it centered a large part of the social and religious interests of the people. Owing mainly to smallpox and vices, the number of Wakashan has fallen off steadily since their first contact with whites. In 1908 there were enumerated in the Dominion of Canada 4,150, to which are to be added 434 Makah in Washington; total, 4,584. Of these 2,090 were Kwakiutl and 2,494 Nootka. (J. R. S.)

Wakonda (Wa-kon'-da). A term employed by the Omaha, Ponca, Osage, Quapaw, Kansa, Oto, Missouri, and Iowa tribes of the Siouan family when the power believed to animate all natural forms is spoken to or spoken of in supplications or rituals. The dialects of the first five tribes are closely related; the Omaha and Ponca speak practically alike; the Osage, Quapaw, and Kansa differ somewhat from the former in pronunciation, while the Oto, Missouri, and Iowa have so far changed their speech as to be unintelligible to the others. The word wakonda, spelled wakanda by Riggs in his Dakota Dictionary, is given by him as a verb signifying 'to reckon as holy or sacred, to worship'; the noun is wakan, and is defined as 'a spirit, something consecrated.' The same authority gives the meaning of wakan, as an adjective, as 'spiritual, sacred, consecrated, wonderful, incomprehensible, mysterious.' The same general meaning that runs through the Dakota words wakonda and wakan inheres in the word wakonda as used by the Omaha and their cognates; with the latter the word may be regarded as an appellative, for while it is the name given to the mysterious all-pervading and life-giving power to which certain anthropomorphic aspects are attributed, the word is also applied to objects or phenomena regarded as sacred or mysterious. These two uses of the word are never confused in the minds of the thoughtful. When during his fast the Omaha sings, "Wakonda, here needy he stands, and I am he!" his address is to "the power that moves," "causes to move," that is, gives life; for the ability to move is to the Omaha mind synonymous with life. In this prayer the Omaha is not crying to those forces or forms spoken of as wakonda in songs that relate to objects seen in dreams or to symbols of magic. This distinction is sometimes difficult for one of another race to follow, but that there is a distinction to the native mind is not to be doubted. The wakan tanka, the great wakan or spirit of the Dakota, is not quite the same as that which the Omaha means by wakonda. The term 'great' in wakan tanka implies a comparison, and such an idea does not seem to belong to wakonda, for wakonda stands by itself, unlike any other, and represents a concept that seems to be born of the Indian's point of view toward nature and natural phenomena, including man himself. To the Omaha nothing is without life: the rock lives, so do the cloud, the tree, the animal. He projects his own consciousness upon all things, and ascribes to them experiences and characteristics with which he is familiar; there is to him something in common between all creatures and all natural forms, a something which brings them into existence and holds them intact; this something he conceives of as akin to his own conscious being. The power which thus brings to pass and holds all things in their living form he designates as wakonda. That he anthropomorphizes this power is evident from his supplication, made with fasting and symbols of humility, by which he seeks to awaken pity or compassion, human attributes, as "here needy he stands," and thus expects to win some kind of recognition. He is taught that when he fasts and prays he must not ask for any special favor or gift; that which he is able to receive will be given him. This teaching throws a side-light on his concept of wakonda, showing that it implies intelligence as well as power; but the concept seems to be vague, and ideas dissolve into indefiniteness in the "mysterious," the "incomprehensible" atmosphere that surrounds the unseen power denominated wakonda.

That there is a creative aspect to wakonda is made clear from the use of the word wakondagi: gi is the sign of possession, therefore the phenomena termed wakondagi evince something belonging to or of the power denominated wakonda. For example, when a child is first able to walk, this new manifestation of ability to move about is called wakondagi; but should a person, from sickness or other disability, lose the power to walk, but recover it, the act of resumption would not be called wakondagi. The first speech of the child is the manifestation of a new power, and is wakondagi. Wakonda is invisible, and therefore allied to the idea of spirit. Objects seen in dreams or visions partake of the idea or nature of spirit, and when these objects speak to man in answer to his entreaty, the act is possible because of the power of wakonda, and the object, be it thunder-cloud, animal, or bird, seen and heard by the dreamer, may be spoken of by him as a wakonda, but he does not mean that they are wakonda. The association in which the term wakonda is used determines the character of its meaning. Wakonda, the power addressed during the fast as having power to help the one standing "in need," is not the same wakonda as the thunder that speaks to a man in a dream is sometimes called; yet there is a relation between the two, not unlike that signified by the term wakondagi when applied to the first manifestation of an ability; for all power, whether shown in the thunder-storm, the hurricane, the animals, or man, is of wakonda. Whatever is mysterious and beyond ordinary experience or effort approaches the realm of the concept which the word wakonda signifies to the Omaha and his cognates.

Wakonda is difficult to define, for exact terms change it from its native uncrytallized condition to something foreign to aboriginal thought. Vague as the concept seems to be to one of another race, to the Indian it is as real and as mysterious as the starry night or the flush of the coming day. See Totem. (A. C. F.)

Wakouingouéchiwek. An Algonquian tribe or band living on a river about 60 leagues s. of Hudson bay and 150 leagues n. w. of Three Rivers, Quebec. They were probably a part of the Mistassin living on Marten r.

Wakpaatonwedan ('those who dwell on the creek'). One of the two early divisions of the Mdewakanton Sioux. They had their village on Rice cr., Minn. (Neill, Hist. Minn., 144, note, 1858). The Mdewakanton as described by Le Sueur (1689) seem to have been composed of this division alone. In 1858 it comprised the following bands: Kiyuksa, Ohanhanska, Tacanhpisapa, Anoginajin, Tintaotonwe, and Oyateshicha.

Wakpokinyan ('flies along the creek'). A Miniconjou Sioux band.

Waksachi. A Shoshonean tribe on the Kaweah r. drainage, extending into the mountains, in s. central California. They lived above the Wikchamni and below the Badwisha. Merriam (Science, xix, 916, 1904) classes them as a "Paiute" tribe in Eshom valley, n. of Kaweah r., where the remnant of the tribe appears now to reside.

Walam Olum. The sacred tribal chronicle of the Lenape or Delawares. The name signifies 'painted tally' or 'red score,' from walam, 'painted,' particularly 'red painted,' and olum, 'a score or tally.' The Walam Olum was first published in 1836 in a work entitled "The American Nations," by Constantine Samuel Rafinesque, an erratic French scholar, who spent a number of years in this country, dying in Philadelphia in 1840. He asserted that it was a translation of a manuscript in the Delaware language, which was an interpretation of an ancient sacred metrical legend of the tribe, recorded in pictographs cut upon wood, which had been obtained in 1820 by a Dr Ward from the Delawares then living in Indiana. He claimed that the original pictograph record had first been obtained, but without explanation, until two years later, when the accompanying songs were procured in the Lenape language from another individual, these being then translated by himself with the aid of various dictionaries. Although considerable doubt was cast at the time upon the alleged Indian record, Brinton, after a critical investigation, arrived at the conclusion that it was a genuine native production, and it is now known that similar ritual records upon wood or birchbark are common to several cognate tribes, notably the Chippewa.

After the death of Rafinesque his manuscripts were scattered, those of the Walam Olum finally coming into the hands of Squier, who again brought the legend to public attention in a paper read before the New York Historical Society in 1848, which was published in the American Review of Feb. 1849, reprinted by Beach in his Indian Miscellany in 1877, and again in a later (15th) edition of Drake's Aboriginal Races of North America. All of these reprints were more or less inaccurate and incomplete, and it remained for Brinton to publish the complete pictography, text, and tradition, with notes and critical investigation of the whole subject, with the aid of native Lenape scholars, in "The Lenape and their Legends, with the complete text and symbols of the Walam Olum," as No. 5 of his library of Aboriginal American Literature, Phila., 1885.

After sifting the evidence as to its authenticity, Brinton concludes (p. 158): "It is a genuine native production, which was repeated orally to some one indifferently conversant with the Delaware language, who wrote it down to the best of his ability. In its present form it can, as a whole, lay no claim either to antiquity or to purity of linguistic form. Yet, as an authentic modern version, slightly colored by European teachings, of the ancient tribal traditions, it is well worth preservation and will repay more study in the future than is given it in this volume. The narrator was probably one of the native chiefs or priests, who had spent his life in the Ohio and Indiana towns of the Lenape, and who, though with some knowledge of Christian instruction, preferred the pagan rites, legends, and myths of his ancestors. Probably certain lines and passages were repeated in the archaic form in which they had been handed down for generations." (J. M.)

originally living on middle Colorado r., above the Mohave tribe, from the great bend eastward, well into the interior chiefly by the chase and on roots and seeds. They are said to have been brave and enterprising, but physically inferior to the Mohave. The Havasupai, who are an offshoot, speak a closely-related language. The Walapai numbered 728 in 1889, 631 in 1897, and 498 in 1910. They are under the administration of a school superintendent on the Walapai res. of 730,880 acres in N. W. Arizona, and are making little progress in civilization. They cultivated only 57 acres during 1904, but owned 2,000 horses. The name Santa Margarita was applied by the Spaniards to one of their rancherias.

Wallaneg. See Woolyneag.

Wallanmi. A Costanoan village formerly within 10 m. of Santa Cruz mission, Cal.—Taylor in Cal. Farmer, Apr. 5, 1860.

Wallawalla ('little river'). A Shabaptian tribe formerly living on lower Wallawalla r. and along the E. bank of the Columbia from Snake r. nearly to the Umatilla in Washington and Oregon. While a distinct dialect, their language is closely related to the Nez Percé. Their number was estimated by Lewis and Clark as 1,600 in 1805, but it is certain this figure included other bands now recognized as independent. By treaty of 1855 they were removed to the Umatilla res. in Oregon, where they are now (1910) said to number 461, but are much mixed with Nez Percés, Umatilla, and Cayuse. In the Wasco treaty of 1855, by which the Warm Springs res. was established, a number of Shabaptian tribes or bands are mentioned as divisions of the Wallawalla which had no real connection with that tribe.

Walpapi. A Shoshonean division, belonging to the Mono-Paviotso branch of the family, closely affiliated with the Yahuskin, with whom they have been officially associated for nearly half a century. By treaty of Aug. 12, 1865, they ceded their territory about the shores of Goose, Silver, Warner, and Harney lakes, Oregon, and were assigned lands in the s. part of Klamath res., established the previous year. The Walpapi and the Yahuskin together have numbered 135 to 166 persons between 1877 and 1891. In 1906 the combined bands (officially designated as "Paiute") on the Klamath res. numbered 113; in 1909, 103. Two of their settlements or camping places are Chakeletsiwish and Kostuets, occupied also by Yahuskin. Their great war chief Pauline, also called Panaine, Paulihe, Pau-le-nee, and Pah-ni-nees, was killed in 1867.

Walpi (from wala, 'gap', 'notch'; opi, locative: 'Place of the notch,' in allusion to a gap in the mesa on which it is situated). One of the 6 villages of the Hopi (q. v.) in N. E. Arizona, situated on the summit of East mesa, at its s. end (for an illustration, see Pueblos). The ancestral clans which founded Walpi built their first village below the present site, on the n. w. side of the mesa point among the foot-hills on the lowest terrace; this site is now marked by a ruin called Kuchaptuvela, 'Ash-hill terrace'. About 1629 the village was moved to a higher terrace, on the w. point of the mesa, at a site covered with ruins known as Kisakobi (q. v.), 'Place of the ladder house,' where was built a mission chapel the remains of walls of which may still be traced. During a large part of the 17th century Spanish missionaries labored here, but with slight success, and in 1680, as a result of the Pueblo rebellion (see Pueblos), the mission was destroyed and the missionary killed, putting an end to efforts to Christianize the Hopi until after Arizona passed into possession of the United States. A short time after the destruction of the mission, impelled by fear of vengeance on the part of the Spaniards, as well as by the increasing attacks of Apache, Navaho, and Ute, the village was removed to the top of the rocky mesa where it now stands. Walpi has three rows of houses separated by courts. The middle or largest row is four stories high, long and narrow, and presents a broken sky-line. This row of buildings is the oldest, having been originally built by the Bear and Snake clans. The main plaza or court lies e. of this row, and communication with the rear court of the village is by means of an alley, roofed by buildings. There is a similar covered entrance at the s. end.

The secret ceremonies of the Hopi are performed in rooms called kivas and kihus, the former isolated from the house groups and used by fraternities of priests composed of different clans, while the kihus are generally limited in use to certain clans. The kivas are rectangular subterranean rooms oriented to the Hopi cardinal points, and are entered by ladders from the roofs. Each kiva has an elevated floor, for the use of spectators, at the n. end, a firehole in the middle of the floor, and a symbolic opening, called the sipapu, in the floor. There are five kivas in Walpi, four of which are built in recesses and walled up on the outside; the fifth is constructed in a depression in the mesa. These are known as the Mungkiva ('Chief kiva'), Wikiwalibi-kiva ('Watch-place kiva'), Alkiva ('Horn kiva'), Chivatokiva ('Goat kiva'), and Nacabkiva ('Half-way kiva'). The kihus are known as the Flute kihu, the Sun kihu, and the Warrior kihu. The western row of houses, separated by a court from the Bear-Snake row, was built by Flute and related clans; the short row on the eastern rim of the mesa, once populous, has now fallen into disuse. In early days it was occupied by the Asa clan, whose descendants now inhabit Sicho-movi.

A mushroom-shaped rock, the result of subaerial erosion, stands in the open area on the s. e. side of the village, and near this rock the public portion of the Snake Dance (q. v.) and of other ceremonies is held.

The direct trails to Walpi are steep and in some places difficult. Many years ago part of the ascent was made at the s. e. side by a ladder drawn up at night. The n. e. trail into Walpi is the most accessible, having been greatly improved in recent years. The population of Walpi is mixed with Tewa and other progressive Pueblo peoples, and has been in closer contact with the whites than any other Hopi pueblo. The progressive character of the Walpi people is shown by the number of modern houses built in recent years at the foot of the mesa near the springs and fields.

The following groups of clans, among others, are represented at Walpi: Chua (Snake), Honau (Bear), Kachina (Sacred Dancer), Patki (Cloud), Pakab (Reed or Arrow), Kokop (Firewood), Asa (Tansy Mustard), Tuwa-Kukuch (Sand-Lizard), Lengya (Flute), Ala (Horn), and Piba-Tabo (Tobacco-Rabbit). The ancestors of these clans lived in pueblo or cliff houses, now ruins, situated in various directions and in some cases remote from Walpi. The original settlers were the Bear people, who are reputed to have come from Jemez (q. v.). These colonists were later joined by the Snake and Horn peoples, whose ancestors lived in extreme n. Arizona. The Kachina clan came from the e.; the Reed people are descendants of women captured at a Hopi town, now a ruin, called Awatobi. The Kokop clan came from Jemez, and made Walpi their home after the fall of their own pueblo, Sikyatki, in prehistoric times. The Patki, Kukuch, and Piba-Tabo originally came from the s., where ruins of their pueblos are still visible at Winslow and near Hardy, Ariz., on Little Colorado r. The Flute people came from n. Arizona, where they once lived with the Horn and Snake clans. The Asa migrated from Zuñi. The sociologic history and growth of Walpi are as follows: (1) Formed by Bear clans; (2) increased by the accession of Snake clans; (3) enlarged by clans after the overthrow of Sikyatki; (4) destruction of Awatobi and assimilation of many clans therefrom; (5) advent of Asa clans from Zuñi; (6) advent of clans from the Little Colorado; (7) advent of the Tewa clans, some of whose descendants now live in Hano.

The population now numbers about 200, but according to Vetancurt it had about 1,200 inhabitants in 1680. This estimate is evidently exaggerated.

Wamdisapa's Band. One of the two divisions of the Wahpekute Sioux, of which Wamdisapa (Black Eagle) was chief between 1842 and 1851. Their predatory habits led to and prolonged a war with the Sauk and Foxes, in consequence of which they separated from the main body of Wahpekute before 1851, going to Vermilion r., S. Dak. Subsequently Inkpaduta (Scarlet Point) was chief of the band, which, after becoming reduced to 10 or 15 lodges, was known by his name. They returned to Spirit lake and Des Moines r., and, their lands having been ceded by the treaty of Mendota, Minn., in 1851, they came into conflict with the Government. Their right to a part of the purchase money being refused, they murdered the settlers and were hunted down by soldiers.

Wamditanka ('Great war eagle'). A chief of one of the bands of Mdewakanton Sioux at the time of the Sioux uprising in 1862; commonly called Big Eagle, and sometimes known as Jerome Big Eagle. According to his personal narrative, recorded by R. L. Holcombe (Minn. Hist. Soc. Coll., VI, pt. 3, 382-400, 1894), he was born in 1827 at the Indian village near the site of Mendota, Dakota co., Minn., and on the death of his father, Gray Iron, succeeded him as chief. In his youth he often went with war parties against the Chippewa and other enemies of his tribe, and on occasion wore a head-dress with six feathers representing as many Chippewa scalps taken by him. Although Wamditanka took part with the Sioux in the uprising of 1862, he claims that he did not participate in the massacres of the settlers, but even used his influence, in some instances, to save from death both whites and converted mixed-bloods. The evidence shows this claim to be substantially correct, and that he was perhaps pressed into the war by his people. At this time his village was on Crow cr., in McLeod co., Minn. His band consisted of about 150 to 200 persons, including about 40 warriors. Soon after the battle of Birch Coolie, Minn., in 1862, Wamditanka and his band, with others, surrendered to Gen. Sibley. He was tried, convicted, and sentenced to three years imprisonment, part of the time at Davenport, Iowa, the remainder at Rock Island, Ill. After his discharge he was converted to Christianity. He was twice married; his second wife was still alive in 1894, at which time his home was at Granite Falls, Yellow Medicine co., Minn. He visited Washington with a delegation of his tribe in 1858, and was one of the signers of the treaty with the Sioux negotiated June 19 of that year. (C. T.)

Wamesit. An important tribe of the Pennacook confederacy, occupying the s. bank of Merrimac r. below the mouth of Concord r., Mass. In King Philip's war of 1675 they suffered severely and decreased so greatly that in 1686 they sold their territory and probably joined the other Pennacook at St Francis in Canada.

Wampanoag ('eastern people'). One of the principal tribes of New England. Their proper territory appears to have been the peninsula on the e. shore of Narragansett bay now included in Bristol co., R. I., and the adjacent parts in Bristol co., Mass. The Wampanoag chiefs ruled all the country extending e. from Narragansett bay and Pawtucket r. to the Atlantic coast, including the islands of Nantucket and Martha's Vineyard. Rhode Island in the bay was also at one time the property of this tribe, but was conquered from them by the Narraganset, who occupied the w. shore of the bay. On the n. their territory bordered that of the tribes of the Massachusetts confederacy. The Nauset of Cape Cod and the Saconnet near Compton, R. I., although belonging to the group, seem to have been in a measure independent. Gosnold visited Martha's Vineyard in 1602 and "trafficked amicably with the natives." Other explorers, before the landing of the Pilgrims, visited the region and provoked the natives by ill treatment. Champlain found those of C. Cod unfriendly, probably on account of previous ill treatment, and had an encounter with them. When the English settled at Plymouth in 1620 the Wampanoag were said to have about 30 villages, and must have been much stronger before the great pestilence of 1617 nearly depopulated the southern New England coast. Their chief was Massasoit, who made a treaty of friendship with the colonists, which he faithfully observed until his death, when he was succeeded by his son, known to the English as King Philip. The bad treatment of the whites and their encroachment upon the lands of the Indians led this chief, then at the head of 500 warriors of his own tribe, to form a combination of all the Indians from Merrimac r. to the Thames for the purpose of driving out or exterminating the whites. The war, which began in 1675 and lasted 2 years, was the most destructive in the history of New England and was most disastrous to the Indians. Philip and the leading chiefs were killed, the Wampanoag and Narraganset were practically exterminated, and the survivors fled to the interior tribes. Many of those who surrendered were sold into slavery, and others joined the various Praying villages in s. Massachusetts. The greater part of the Wampanoag who remained in the country joined the Saconnet. The Indians of C. Cod and Martha's Vineyard generally remained faithful to the whites, the latter persistently refusing to comply with Philip's solicitations to join him in the contest.

The principal village of the Wampanoag, where the head chief resided, was Pokanoket. Other villages probably belonging to the tribe were Acushnet, Agawam, Assameekg, Assawompset, Assonet, Betty's Neck, Chaubaqueduck, Coaxet, Cohannet, Cooxissett, Cowsumpsit, Gayhead, Herring Pond, Jones River, Kitteamut, Loquasquscit, Mattakeset, Mattapoiset, Miacomit, Munponset, Namasket, Nashamoies, Nashanekammuck, Nukkehkummees, Nunnepoag, Ohkonkemme, Pachade, Pocasset, Quittaub, Saconnet, Saltwater Pond, Sanchecantacket, Seconchqut, Shawomet, Shimmoah, Talhanio, Toikiming, Wauchimoqut, Wawayontat. Wampapin. A name for the water chinquapin, Nelumbo lutea, corrupted from wankipin, 'crooked root,' the Chippewa name for the long, nodose rootstock of the plant, which after being boiled to destroy its acidity is used as food. It is called tarawa and taluwa, 'hollow root,' by the Oto and Quapaw. The name is still further corrupted in the West to yankapin. (W. R. G.)

chief of the country s. of Boston, Mass., a son of Chickataubut (q. v.), from whom the English purchased much land. He was killed in 1669 in a battle with the Mohawk. (A. F. C.)

Wampeag. See Peag, Wampum.

Wampee. A name used in parts of the Southern states for the pickerel-weed (Pontederia caudata). Gerard (Garden and Forest, July 26, 1896) says that the term wampee was applied by Drayton in 1802 to the Indian turnip (Arisæma triphyllum), and by Rafinesque in 1830 to Peltandra alba. (A. F. C.)

Wamping. A former village, Mohican or Wappinger, on the lower Hudson r., N. Y., under Iroquois protection.—Albany treaty (1664) in N. Y. Doc. Col. Hist., III, 68, 1853.

Wampoos. The American elk, Cervus americana, called also gray moose and wapiti; an animal about the size of a horse and strikingly similar to the stag of Europe. It was formerly extensively distributed throughout the present limits of the United States, but is now confined mostly to the n. and n. w. portions. The name is of Abnaki origin, from wanbus or wanpus, 'white moose'; the Algonquians making no distinction between white and gray. (W. R. G.)

Wampum (the contracted form of New England Algonquian wampümpeak, wampümpeage, or wampömpeag, expressed phonetically as wanpanpiak or wanbanbiag, the component lexical elements of which are wamp, for wanb, a derivative of wab, '(being) white'; umpe or ompe, for anbi or anpi, 'a string (of shell-beads)'; ak or ag, the grammatic sign of the animate plural. As the native expression was too cumbersome for ready utterance by the New England colonists, the sentence-word was divided by them into wampum, and peak or peage, regardless of the exact line of phonetic division between the component lexical elements of the expression). The shell beads in use among the North American Indians, wrought out of several kinds of shells found along both the western and the eastern littorals of the continent, including various species of Veneridæ, as the poquaûhaug (Venus mercenaria), usually contracted to quahaug or quahog, formerly sometimes called hens, the common round or hard-shell clam, which in the S. sometimes attains a weight of 4 pounds; the periwinkle (Pyrula carica and P. canaliculata), or winkle, the meteaûhock of Roger Williams; the whelk (Buccinum undatum); fresh-water shells of the genus Unio; and, on the Pacific coast, the Dentalium (D. entalis, and D. indianorum), the abalone or haliotis (H. rufescens, H. splendens, and H. cracherodii), the scallop shells or pectens, and the olivella (O.

biplicata); and a number of other sea-shells.

In the manufacture of these shell beads much patient labor and a marked degree of skill and careful manipulation were required. Their manufacture was apparently not confined to any class of persons among the natives, for Roger Williams (Key, 128, 1827) remarks that in general those who live along the seashore manufacture the beads, and that "as many make as will." In New England and along the Atlantic seaboard wampum was chiefly of two colors: the white, and the violet or purple, which latter varied in shade from pale or pink violet to dark rich purple. The value of these shell beads was determined by their color and degree of finish. In form they were cylindrical, being from about $\frac{1}{8}$ to $\frac{1}{4}$ in. in diameter, and from $\frac{1}{2}$ to $\frac{3}{4}$ in. in length. Notwithstanding the abundant literature concerning the multifarious uses of these shell beads in trade, in the embroidering of articles of dress, the making of objects for personal adornment and badges of rank and official dignity, and in the fiducial transactions of private and public life, no technical statement of the exact methods employed by the natives in their manufacture is available.

According to Barber and Howe (Hist. Coll. N. J., 1844) the method of manufacture after contact with the whites was as follows: The wampum was wrought, largely by the women, from the thick blue portions of the shell, and the process, though simple, required a skill acquired only by long practice. The intense hardness and brittleness of the materials made it impossible to wear, grind, and bore the shell by machinery alone. First the thin portions were removed with a light sharp hammer, and the remainder was clamped in a scissure sawed in a slender stick, and was then ground into an octagonal figure, an inch in length and half an inch in diameter. This piece being ready for boring was inserted into another piece of wood, sawed like the first stick, which was firmly fastened to a bench, a weight being so adjusted that it caused the scissure to grip the shell and to hold it securely. The drill was made from an untempered handsaw, ground into proper shape and tempered in the flame of a candle. Braced against a steel plate on the operator's chest and nicely adjusted to the center of the shell, the drill was rotated by means of the common hand-bow. To clean the aperture, the drill was dextrously withdrawn while in motion, and was cleared by the thumb and finger of the particles of shell. From a vessel hanging over the closely clamped shell drops of water fell on the drill to cool it, for particular care was exercised lest the shell break from the heat caused by friction. When the drilling reached halfway through the shell, the shell was reversed and the boring was completed from the opposite side. To finish the surface and to shape the edges were the next processes. A wire about a foot long was fastened at one end to a bench; beneath and parallel with the wire was a grindstone with a grooved face, which was worked by a foot-treadle. The beads were strung on the wire and the free end grasped in the left hand and the wire of beads was drawn into the groove of the fast-revolving grindstone. By means of a flat piece of wood, held in the right hand, the beads were continually turned. By this process the beads soon became round, smooth, and polished, and were then strung on hempen strings about a foot in length. Five to ten such strings could be made in a day, and were sold to country merchants at the rate of 12½ cents apiece.

Wampum very early in the intercourse between the whites and the Indians, as it already was among themselves, became a medium of exchange at fixed values, not only in merchandise but also in dollars and cents. So important was this use of it that Weeden (Johns Hopkins Univ. Stud., 2d s., VIII-IX, 1884) wrote a monograph on wampum with the suggestive title, "Indian Money as a Factor in New England Civilization," in which this phase of the subject is fully discussed. Powers, Stearns, Goddard, and others mention facts showing that shell money at an early time on the Pacific coast became a medium of exchange, not only among the Indians but also among the whites. Goddard (Life and Culture of the Hupa, 48-49, 1903) says that a single shell of the decorated dentalium is measured and its value determined by the creases on the left hand; that strings of these shells reaching from the thumb-nail to the point of the shoulder contain 11 of the largest and 14 of the smallest of these shells; that some of the natives have a set of lines tattooed on the inner side of the left forearm, which indicate the length of 5 shells of the several standards of length. Rosendale (Wampum Currency, 1896) shows by ample citations from the ordinances of New Netherland that the period from 1641 to 1662 "marked the decadence of wampum as currency." His article is valuable and interesting for giving the value of the different kinds and grades of wampum in stivers and guilders at the periods mentioned.

Williams (op. cit.), speaking of the poquaúhock or quaúhock, called hens by the English, or the hard round clam, says that the Indians "break out of the shell about half an inch of a black part of it, of which they make their suckáúhock, or black money," and that they manufacture from the stem or stock of the metáúhock, or periwinkle, their "wámpam or white money," of half the value of the suckáúhock or black money or shell beads. In his lexicon Williams gives the words sawhúog and sawhúachick as the native terms for 'loose beads,' enomphósa-chick as that for 'strung ones,' and máche-quoce as 'a girdle, or belt,' curiously made from one to five or more inches in width of these shell beads. Such a belt, he tells us, was worth sometimes more than £10 sterling, and was worn either as a girdle or as a scarf or sash around the shoulders or breasts, hence the common name of belt for this article. Strings were also worn as ornaments around the necks of women and children. Williams quaintly adds: "Princes make rich caps and aprons (or small breeches) of these beads, thus curiously strung into many forms and figures: their black and white finely mixed together." As to their means of manufacture he says also that before the Indians obtained awl blades from Europeans they "made shift to bore this their shell money with stone," and that the work of smoothing the beads "they do on stones" and other things.

Lawson (Hist. Car., 315-316, 1714) writes that the Indians of Carolina had two different kinds of shell money, called peak and ronok, chiefly the former kind, which at New York went by the name of wampum, and was used as current money. He believed that peak was used on the continent "as far as the bay of Mexico." The peak, he says, was called "porcelain" by many writers, and was made in great quantities in New York and "with us in some measure." It was made from shells found on the coast, very large and hard, so that it was difficult to cut them; that some English smiths attempted "to drill this sort of shell money" for profit, but found the task too hard, and saw that nothing could be gained, for the "drilling was the most difficult part of the work to the Englishmen, which the Indians manage with a nail stuck in a cane or reed, which was rolled by them on their thighs with the right hand and the bit of shell was held in the left, so in time they drill a hole quite through it, which is a tedious work; but especially in making their ronok, four of which will scarce make one length of their wampum." He does not say how the drilling was done before the Indians had nails. For this shell money "skins, furs, slaves, and whatever the Indians possessed might be bought; by it they might be enticed to do anything—to part with anything except their children for slaves; by its means murders and other crimes were adjusted and settled." Beverley (Hist. Va., bk. III, 58, 1705) says that the Indians of the Virginia and Carolinalittoral had peak and ronoke; that the peak was of two colors, dark purple and white; that they (presumably the purple and the white) were alike in size and figure, being made of different portions of the same shell (evidently the po- quaúhock); they were polished as smooth as glass, and were strung through holes drilled through their centers; the purple or dark-colored beads were more valuable than the white, bringing among the Indian traders 18 pence per yard, while the white brought only 9 pence, and that these Indians made of these shell beads pipes (probably tubular objects), 2 or 3 in. long and "thicker than ordinary, which are much more valuable;" that they also made runtees of the same shell, grinding them smooth as the beads of the peak, "the strung beads," and that these runtees were either large like an oval bead, drilled through the length of the oval, or they were flat and circular, nearly an inch in width and $\frac{1}{2}$ in. thick, and were drilled edgewise. The peak, the runtees, and the "pipes," he continues, were used for coronets, bracelets, belts, or else the shell beads were made into long strings to hang down before the breast, to lace up their garments, or to adorn their tomahawks and other weapons and implements; lastly, he adds, that these Indians made another kind of beads, of less value than the other, from the cockle shell, which was broken into small fragments, which were left with rough edges, and drilled through in the same manner as the other shell beads forming the peak; these rough-edged "beads" were called roenoke (the ronoak of Lawson), and they were used in the same manner as the peak or strung beads.

To the Iroquois and to many other Indians white as a color was auspicious, and its use in ritual and ceremony therefore indicated peace, health, welfare, and prosperity—ideas expressed by white wampum when ceremonially employed; on the contrary, black as a color was inauspicious, and its use therefore indicated hostility, sorrow, death, condolence, and mourning—ideas expressed by dark or purple wampum when ceremonially employed; nevertheless the dark or purple variety of wampum was commercially much more valuable than the white kind, and the darker its shade the more valuable it was. Commonly the ratio was as one to two. In commercial transactions wampum was used strung or unstrung. In trade it was usually exchanged by count when loose, by the string, or by the fathom. The fathom was a count. Williams (Key, chap. xiv) says that piuckqual was the native name for 10 sixpence, or 60 pence, and that this was called nquittômpeg, that is, 'one fathom,' 5 shillings. So a fathom was a count of beads, the number of which was determined by the number legally current for a penny. Williams said that 6 white and 3 black beads were current for a penny; therefore at this ratio 360 white and 180 black beads constituted a fathom. A large portion of the white shell beads was consumed in the manufacture of various articles of personal adornment and in the embroidery of various articles of raiment for both men and women. For use in public affairs and in official communications, in ritualistic and fiducial transactions, wampum was wrought into two well-known products—strings, often tied into bundles or sheaves of strings, and belts or scarfs or sashes. The first variety was made originally by stringing the wampum beads on small strands of skin or sinew, and later on a strong thread or on several threads twisted together; these strings of shell beads were called "branches" by French writers generally, probably including the bunches or sheaves. In making these strings of beads it was possible, by using all white, all purple, or by a combination of the two colors in definite proportions, regulated by the color symbolism of the people, to convey mnemonically a variety or a difference of ideas, indicated by the proportion, the sequence of the two colors, and the figures or outlines portrayed by them on the strand or string; for example, there might be one white bead and then one purple bead alternately on the strand, or a white bead and then two purple beads alternately, or there might be two or more white beads followed by two or more purple beads alternately on the strand; or the strand might be composed one half of white and the other half of purple beads; or one half of the string of beads might be arranged in one way and the other half in another. Thus it was possible by these simple devices to indicate by means of the two available colors a number of combinations, differing one from another sufficiently to convey a number of ideas without much chance for confusion. The white strings tinged red by vermilion or some other red color were used as a challenge or declaration of war, or as an invitation to friends to join in a war. For these reasons some strings of beads consisted wholly of white beads, while others were composed entirely of purple or dark beads. A string composed entirely of dark beads is the official string of beads by which one of the Iroquois tribes notifies its brother and cousin tribes of the death of one or more of its chiefs. White strings were commonly employed in matters of ordinary routine, requiring only some degree of formality, or merely as preliminary exhibits to others of more and deeper import. The second kind of shell-bead product was the more or less broad sash, scarf, or belt, on which the white and the purple beads, first suitably proportioned on strings, were fastened together by small strands of sinew or skin in such manner as to form a neat and durable fabric. By suitable combinations of the two colors dominant in the beads various symbolic figures and devices were neatly and deftly wrought into the body of the belt or scarf. Sometimes the fabric took the form of a symbolic sun. But the breadth and length of the belt or sash, and the proportions of the white and the purple beads composing it, were naturally determined by the nature and importance of the occasion for its use. According to Lafitau (1724), a very good authority, the usual size of a belt in his time was 11 strands of 180 beads each, or about 1,980 wampum beads. There are references to belts composed of 6,000 and 7,000 beads, and proportionately long. Some belts were employed to convey a double message—that is, one half to one person and the other half to another, or two messages to one person or people.

The chiefs and the elders of the people were accustomed to assemble to rehearse the matters mnemonically connected with the several wampum strings, sheaves of strings, and belts in their keeping. In complex and important affairs, certain of these annalists were charged with remembering only a particular portion of the record, while to others were entrusted other portions, thereby rendering it the more easy to remember the details of the entire matter without forgetting any material circumstance. To aid these annalists and others they devised the complex and varied forms of wampum strands, sheaves, and belts already noted. Belts were used for various purposes, as the ratification of treaties, the confirmation of alliances, and the authentication of proposals made by one people to another.

In addition to packs of skins and furs, the public treasure of a people, such as the tribes of the Iroquois league, consisted largely of wampum, together with the strands, bunches, or sheaves of strings or strands, and the belts, scarfs, or sashes made from it, as above described. Not having the use of writing of any kind, the Indians, naturally apt to forget events and occurrences happening among them, devised the variety of uses for wampum and its products.

In addition to the descriptive names or merely denotive designations of wampum and the things made from it, a number of terms of political import were applied to these wampum strings and belts by the Iroquoian tribes, which indicate the importance attached to these several objects. By all these tribes the term kanā' 'sā, 'a braid or plaited object,' was applied to strings of wampum of whatever nature. The Mohawk applied the term qāion' nī to the belt of wampum, while the Onondaga and the Seneca use kās' hūēn' 'tā. Figuratively, and perhaps ceremonially, these people apply the following names to wampum employed officially and formally: kari' 'hūā (qāi' 'hūā, dialectic variant), 'the business, the affair, or the authentic credential'; gawēn' nā, 'the voice, the word, or the proposition,' because every proposal of a public nature, as an edict, required for its authentication a belt or a string of wampum according to its importance and to the exigency of the case; and kāian-erēn' 'serā (qāianēn' 'sā, a dialectic variant), 'welfare,' 'the commonwealth,' 'justice,' here 'the law.' For wampum the Mohawk have the name onēko' r' hā, which by strict dialectic changes of sounds (n=t, and the dropping of r) becomes otko' 'ā, which is the Onondaga and the Seneca name for it.

The Dutch about New York (Manhattan) applied the Algonquian term sewan (also written sewant, seward, zee-wand, etc.), 'scattered or loose (beads),' to all shell beads, in the same manner that the English called all peage, or strung beads, wampum, 'white.' The Dutch applied the name Sewan hacky, 'Wampum land,' to Long Island, perhaps in imitation of the natives, for it was noted for its abundance of shells suited to shell-bead making. In New England mow-hackees, 'black beads,' was used.

As early as 1640, in New England and especially in New Netherland, there was much trouble and discontent owing to the manufacture of counterfeit and unfinished wampum. It was complained that payments were made in nothing but rough, unpolished stuff, while the good, polished beads, commonly called "Manhattan wampum," was exported, concealed, or at least not to be had at all. Many ordinances of the Director and Council of New Netherland were passed in more or less successful attempts to remedy this growing evil. The following citation from such an ordinance, passed May 30, 1650, shows to what an alarming extent wampum was counterfeited: "Whereas, we have by experience, and for a long time seen the decline and daily depreciation of the loose wampum among which are circulating many with holes and half finished; also some of stone, bone, glass, muscle-shells, horn, yea, even of wood and broken beads, together with the manifold complaints of the inhabitants that they cannot go to market with such wampum, nor obtain any commodities, not even a small loaf of white bread or pot of beer from the traders, bakers, or tapsters for loose wampum. . . . in order hereby to prevent the further importation of all lump and unperforated wampum, so as in future to obviate all misunderstanding, the Hon'ble Director and Council aforesaid, do ordain that the commercial shall pass and be good pay as heretofore, to wit, six white or three black for one stiver; on the contrary, poor strung wampum shall pass eight white and four black for one stiver [stiver=one penny]."

On the Pacific coast, according to Powers, Gibbs, and other writers, immense quantities of shell money or beads were in circulation, the value of which fluctuated greatly from tribe to tribe. Much of it was made from the so-called tusk-shell, a species of dentalium, which was obtained in the following manner: To the end of a suitable pole a strip of wood was secured, being placed transversely to the line of the pole, and first studded with bone or wooden teeth. From the bow of a canoe or boat, propelled usually by a woman, the tusk-shell fisher stood and carefully prodded the sands at the bottom of the water a number of times with his comblike instrument, and then drew it up to see whether any of the shells had become impaled on the teeth of the instrument. Sometimes four or five of the shells were brought up, and sometimes none at all. This was a practical method of obtaining these shells, as they are not found between tide marks. The form of this shell, which gave it its name of tusk-shell, is tooth- or fang-shaped, having an orifice at both ends. A fine specimen is about 3 in. in length, but usually they are much shorter. With the small end invariably downward, it is found burrowed in the sand in from 4 to 8 fathoms of water in sheltered harbors or inlets. The women string these shells neatly on bits of dried sinew; they are afterward ornamented with fragments of haliotis shell and with tufts of mountain-goat's wool. A string of 25 of these shells, which, placed end to end, reached one fathom or 6 ft, was called a hiaqua (q. v.) and was the standard of value. The short or broken shells were strung in like manner, and these inferior strings were called kopkops, of which 40 were equal in value to one hiaqua. Bands or belts were also made of dentalium shells, and these also served as currency and for ornament. But according to Gibbs "forty to the fathom" was the standard, or one hiaqua, which would purchase as a rule one male and two female slaves: this was approximately £50 sterling. According to Powers and others alli-co-chick was the name of this tusk-money in California. In the central and southern part of the state there was a staple currency known as hawock, or hawok, made from the shells of "a bivalve, a ponderous clam when adult." The shell was cut into small disks, of which the larger were worth about 25 cents and the smaller about 4 cents. Some of the disks, 2 in. in diameter and $\frac{1}{2}$ in. in thickness, were worth a dollar apiece. Powers mentions a necklace of hawok, worn by a young woman, which was 10 yds long, consisting of 1,160 pieces, and was worth about \$225. The olivella shell money was known as kol-kol, or col-col. The shell was prepared by simply grinding off the apex and stringing it mouth-to-mouth with others. This money, it is said, was "slightly esteemed," perhaps owing to the great abundance of the species. The abalone or haliotis shell money was known as uhl-lo or ül-lo; this was made from a very beautiful shell, rather too large and cumbersome to be used as money. The shell was prepared for use by cutting it into oblong strips from 1 in. to 2 in. long and about $\frac{1}{2}$ in. in width. Holes were drilled near one end of the strip, and the strips were then strung edge to edge. Ten pieces constituted a string. The larger pieces were worth \$1 apiece, thus making the value of a string about \$10.

Wampum, The. See Waumegesako.

Wamsutta. Cotton cloth manufactured at the Wamsutta mills at New Bedford, Mass., named after a Massachusetts sachem, the eldest son of Massasoit. The name is apparently a contraction of Womosutta, 'Loving-heart'. (W. R. G.)

Wanaghe (Wanare, 'ghost'). A division of the Kansa.—Dorsey in 15th Rep. B. A. E., 231, 1897.

Wanamakewajenenik ('people eating meat out of skin bags'—that is, 'pemmican-eaters'). A Chippewa band formerly living near Lake of the Woods, on the N. border of Minnesota.

Tecomimoni.—Chauvignerie (1736) quoted by Schoolcraft, Ind. Tribes, III, 556, 1853. Wank-mâk-wâjénénik.—Long, Exped. St. Peter's R., II, 153, 1824. Wanama'kôwajink.—Wm. Jones, inf'n, 1905.

Wananish. See Ouananiche.

Wanashquompskut. See Squam.

Wanatah. A Potawatomi village formerly in La Porte co., Ind., a short distance E. of the present Wanatah.—Hough, map in Indiana Geol. Rep. 1882, 1883.

Waneta ('The Charger'). A Yanktonai Sioux of the Pabaksa or Cuthead band, son of Shappa or Red Thunder; born on Elm r., in the present Brown co., S. Dak., about 1795. He enlisted with his father in the English service in the War of 1812, and fought valiantly at Ft Meigs and Sandusky, winning his name by his bravery in charging the Americans in the open, and being seriously wounded in the battle at the latter place. After the war he was given a captain's commission by the British, and visited England. He continued to sympathize with the British until 1820, when he attempted to destroy Ft Snelling by stealth, but being thwarted in his enterprise by Col. Snelling, he afterward heartily supported American interests. Waneta was a dominant chief of the Sioux and exceedingly active in his operations. He signed the treaty of trade and intercourse at Ft Pierre, July 5, 1825, and on Aug. 17 of the same year signed the treaty of Prairie du Chien which fixed the boundaries of the Sioux territory. He died in 1848 at the mouth of the Warreconne, the present Beaver cr., Emmons co., N. Dak. His name is variously spelled, as Wahnaataa, Wanotan, and Wawnahton. (D. R.)

Wanigan. A receptacle in which small supplies or a reserve stock of goods are kept; also a large chest in which the lumbermen of Maine and Minnesota keep their spare clothing, pipes, tobacco, etc. Called also wongan-box, and spelled wangun and wangan. (2) A boat used on the rivers of Maine for the transportation of the entire personnel of a logging camp, along with the tools of the camp and provisions for the trip. See Wammikan. (3) A place in a lumber camp where accounts are kept and the men paid.

"Running the wangan" is the act of taking a loaded boat down a river, from station to station, particularly in swiftly flowing water. The word is from Abnaki waniigan, 'trap'; literally, that into which any object strays, wanders, or gets lost; a receptacle for catching and holding stray objects; from wan, 'to wander', 'go astray', 'get lost', -igan, often used in Abnaki in the sense of 'trap'. Similarly, a locker in a hunting phaëton is called a 'trap', and this eventually gave its name to the vehicle itself. (W. R. G.)

Wanineath (Wanineath). A sept of the Seshart, a Nootka tribe.—Boas in 6th Rep. N. W. Tribes Can., 32, 1890.

Waninkikikarachada ('they call themselves after a bird'). A Winnebago gens. Thunder.—Morgan, Anc. Soc., 157, 1877. Wa-kon'-ohâ-râ.—Ibid. Wa-niâk'-i-ki'-ka-ra'-ta-da.—Dorsey in 15th Rep. B. A. E., 240, 1897.

Wankapin. See Wampapin.

Wanlish. A division of the true Kwakiutl, probably named mistakenly from its chief.—Lord, Nat. in Brit. Col., I, 165, 1866.

Wannalancet. A son of Passaconaway, who succeeded his father as sachem of Penacook on the Merrimac. He was a life-long friend of the English and signed the treaty of Dover. In 1659 Wannalancet was imprisoned for debt. (A. F. C.)

Wannawegha ('broken arrow'). A former band of the Miniconjou Sioux, possibly identical with the Wanneewackataonelar band of Lewis and Clark.

Wannawega.—Dorsey in 15th Rep. B. A. E., 220, 1897. Wan-nawexa.—Ibid. Wan-nee-wack-a-ta-on-lar.—Lewis and Clark Discov., 84, 1806.

Wapacut. A dictionary name for the great white owl, or snowy owl (Nyctea scandiaca): probably from one of the northern dialects of Algonquian, Wood Cree or Labrador, in which wapacuthu would correspond to the Cree wâpaskisiw and the Chippewa wābakosi, 'it is white,' from the radical wāp or wāb, 'white.' (A. F. C.)

Wapakoneta (Wa-pa-ko-nē'-ta, 'white jacket'). A Shawnee village, named from a chief, on Auglaize r., on the site of the present Wapakoneta, Auglaize co., Ohio. The Shawnee settled there by consent of the Miami, after losing their country on the Scioto by the treaty of Greenville in 1795. They occupied it as their principal village until 1831, when they sold their reservation and removed to the W. It was the residence of Logan. (J. M.)

Wapakwe (Wā-pa-kwe') The Opossum gens of the Mahican.

Wapasha ('Red Leaf'). A succession of chiefs of the Mdewakanton Sioux, extending through tradition to a time immemorial. The first Wapasha of which there is historical knowledge was born at the head of Rum r., Minn., in 1718. His father was a chief of the same name, and his mother a Chippewa captive. In 1747, through relatives of his mother, he negotiated peace between the Chippewa and his own people. About 1763 an English trader, known to the Indians as Mallard Duck, was killed at his store at St Anthony's falls by a Sioux named Ixatape, in retaliation of which the English withdrew trade from the Sioux. By this time they had become so dependent on the traffic that destitution and suffering ensued, and Wapasha determined to take the murderer to Quebec and deliver him to the English. In company with a hundred of his tribesmen he started with Ixatape, but one by one the members of the party returned to the Mississippi, so that by the time Green Bay was reached but few remained, and there Ixatape escaped; but, undaunted, Wapasha with five others kept on, and, reaching Quebec, offered himself as a vicarious sacrifice for the sins of his people. His unselfish action made a deep impression upon the English, and he was afterward accorded much honor. He led the Sioux in a well-planned campaign in 1778 to drive back the Chippewa and recover the ancestral lands of the Sioux about Spirit lake, Minn., but after some notable victories his party fell into ambush at the mouth of Elk r. and many of his warriors were slain. Two years later he was able to avenge this loss upon the Chippewa in a notable battle near Elk r. He served the English in the Revolution, and upon his visit to Mackinaw, Col. DePeyster, the commandant, dedicated to him a poem and made him the subject of a great ovation. He served in the West with Langlade, but his service was not of great importance. Before his death, which occurred about 1799, he established his band at the site of Winona, Minn., at a village called Kiyuksa (q. v.).

WAPASHA II succeeded his father and inherited the latter's mild temperament and benevolent disposition. He came into notice when he met Lieut. Z. M. Pike, in April, 1806, at Prairie du Chien, and advised the latter to make Little Crow the American chief of the Sioux. He conceived a liking for Americans which proved to be lasting. Although he was in nominal alliance with the English in the War of 1812, he was constantly under suspicion of disloyalty to them, and Rollette, his son-in-law, was court-martialed on the charge that he was in collusion with Wapasha against English interests. After the war he was very prominent in all the relations between the whites and the Sioux, and died about 1855.

WAPASHA III, known as Joseph Wapasha, succeeded his father as chief of the old Red Leaf band, and went with his people to the reservation on upper Minnesota r. He was opposed to the outbreak of 1862, but when it was forced by Little Crow he mildly assisted in it. After the war he was removed to the Missouri with his people and finally located at Santee, Nebr. He signed the treaty of 1868, which ended the Red Cloud war, and died Apr. 23, 1876.

WAPASHA IV (Napoleon), the son of Joseph, is (1909) nominal chief of the Santee at Santee agency, Nebr. He is civilized and a citizen. (D. R.)

Wapato. See Wappatoo.

Wapello ('chief'). Head chief of the Fox tribe, born at Prairie du Chien, Wis., in 1787. His village was on the E. side of the Mississippi, near the foot of Rock id., and not far from Black Hawk's village. In 1816 it was one of the three principal settlements in the vicinity of Ft Armstrong, Iowa, opposite the present Rock Island, Ill. Although stout and short of stature, Wapello was of attractive appearance, owing partly to his kindly expression; he was peaceful and intelligent, and entertained friendly regard for the whites. Like Keokuk, and unlike Black Hawk, he was willing to abide by the terms of the treaty of 1804 which provided for the removal of the Indians to the W. of the Mississippi, and in 1829 he quietly removed to Muscatine slough with his people, and later settled near the present Wapello, Louisa co., Iowa, in which state a county was afterward named in his honor. Wapello was next in rank to Keokuk, whom he accompanied with others to the E. in 1837, in charge of their agent, Gen. Joseph M. Street. While in Boston, and in reply to an address by Gov. Everett, Wapello made a speech expressing sentiments favorable to the whites, which was received with great applause. He died while on a hunting trip near the present Ottumwa, Iowa, Mar. 15, 1842. In accordance with his request he was buried near Gen. Street, to whom he had been deeply attached. A monument has been erected to his memory at Agency City, Iowa. Wapello was one of the signers of the following treaties between the United States and the Sauk and Foxes: Ft Armstrong, Sept. 3, 1822; Prairie du Chien, July 15, 1830; Ft Armstrong, Sept. 21, 1832; Dubuque co., Iowa, Sept. 28, 1836; Washington, Oct. 21, 1837. See Fulton, Red Men of Iowa, 1882; Stevens, Black Hawk War, 1903; McKenney and Hall, Ind. Tribes, 1854. (F. S. N.)

Wapeminskink (Wah-pi-mins'-kink, 'chestnut-tree place'). A former Delaware town on the w. fork of White r., at the site of Anderson, Madison co., Ind. From being the residence of Anderson (Kök-tō'-wā-nūnd, 'making a cracking noise'), the principal chief, about 1800-1818, it was commonly known as Anderson's Town. The land was sold in 1818. (J. P. D.)

Anderson's Town.—Hough, map, in Indiana Geol. Rep. 1882, 1883. Kik-the-swe-mud.—Hough, ibid. (=Koktowhanund, the chief). Wah-pi-mins'-kink.—Dunn, True Ind. Stories, 253, 1909. Wapeminskink.—Brinton, Lenape Leg., 124, 1885 (incorrectly identified with Wapicomekoke).

Wapicomekoke (Wah-pi-ko-me-kunk, 'White-river town', from Wah-pi-ko-me'-kah, 'white waters,' the Miami and old Delaware name of White r., Ind.). A former town of the Munsee branch of the Delawares, on the site of the present Muncie, Delaware co., Ind. It was the easternmost town of the Delawares in Indiana, and the first reached by the trails from the E., N., and S. It was formed by removal from an older town a short distance up the river, commonly known as Outainink (Utenink, 'at the place of the town'), or Old Town. It has been confounded with a neighboring Delaware village, Wapeminskink, better known as Anderson's Town. The land was sold in 1818. (J. P. D.)

Munsey Town.—Treaty of 1818 in U. S. Ind. Treat., 493, 1873. Wah-pi-ko-me-kunk.—J. P. Dunn, inf'n, 1907. Wapicomekoke.—Ibid. Woapikamikunk.—Brinton, Lenape Leg., 124, 1885.

Wapisiwisiwininiwak ('Swan creek men,' from wapisi, 'swan'; sibi, 'river'; miniwak, 'men'). A band of Chippewa that formerly resided on Swan cr., near L. St Clair, Mich. They sold the greater part of their lands in 1836 and part of them removed to Kansas, where they were joined by the rest in 1864. Their descendants now form part of the mixed band of "Munsee and Chippewa" in Kansas, numbering together about 90 individuals. (J. M.)

Swan-Creek band.—Washington treaty (1836) in U. S. Ind. Treat., 227, 1873. Wáisiwiniwag.—Wm. Jones, inf'n, 1905 (correct name). Wapisiwisiwininiwak.—Gatschet, Ojibwa MS., B. A. E., 1882.

Wapiti (wapiti, 'white rump'). The Shawnee name of Cervus canadensis, the American elk, called also gray moose, the mos or mus of the Lenape, the marus of the Kenebec, the wanboz of the Penobscot, the mishene of the Chippewa, the shewea of the Miami, the makyase of the Pequot, etc.; a deer about the size of the horse and so strikingly similar in appearance to the stag of Europe that it was supposed by the early settlers to be the same species and was called by the same name. Its horns, which are round and not flat, like those of the moose and caribou, are 5 to 6 ft long and much branched, and its color in summer is light chestnut-red with white rump, in winter grayish, and to the latter fact the Penobscot name (meaning 'white moose') alludes. The animal was formerly extensively distributed throughout the present limits of the United States, but is now confined mostly to the N. and N. W. portions. In Minnesota it is found in large herds, and, on the upper Missouri, Yellowstone, and other streams, in still larger ones. Of the vast numbers in these regions, some idea may be formed from the piles of shed horns which the Indians were in the habit of heaping up in the prairies. One of these, in Elkhorn prairie, was, before its destruction in 1850, about 15 ft high, and was for many years a conspicuous landmark. Others, still larger, are found on the upper Yellowstone. (W. R. G.)

Wapon. The extinct White Shell-bead clan of Sia pueblo, New Mexico.

Wa'pon.—Stevenson in 11th Rep. B. A. E., 19, 1894. Wápon-háno.—Hodge in Am. Anthr., IX, 352, 1896 (hano='people').

Wapoo. A small tribe of the Cusabo group, formerly living on Wapoo cr. and the immediately adjacent coast of South Carolina. They have long been extinct. Bartram (Trav., 54, 1792) mentions them among the tribes in the vicinity of Charleston, which he says "cramped the English plantations." Nothing further has been recorded in regard to them. The tribe is designated on De l'Isle's map (Winsor, Hist. Am., II, 1886), about the year 1700, under the name Ouapamo, as situated on Wingau r., S. C.

Wappatoo. A bulbous root (Sagittaria variabilis) used for food by the Indians of the W. and N. W.: from the Cree wápatow or the Chippewa wápato or wábadó, 'white fungus.' This word, spelled also wapato, has passed into the Chinook jargon of the Columbia r. region, in which wappatoo means 'potato,' but its origin is very uncertain. The Chippewa name wápato has been applied to some plant called rhubarb. As a place name it occurs in Wapato, an island off the coast of Washington, and in Wapato, a village in Washington co., Oreg. (A. F. C. W. R. G.)

Wappatoo. The tribes on and around Sauvies id. at the mouth of Willamette r., Oreg. Under this name Lewis and Clark (Exped., II, 472-473, 1814) included Nechacokee (Nechacoke), Shoto, Multnomah, Clannahqueh (Clahnaquah), Nemaquinier, Cathlacommatups (Cathlacomatup), Cathlanaquiah, Clackstar (Tlatskanai), Claninnatas, Cathlacumups, Clannarminnamuns (Kathlamini-mim), Quathlahpohle (Cathlapotle), Cathlamahs (Cathlamet). The name (Wapato Lake) is now officially used to designate a small remnant of 4 Indians on Grande Ronde res., Oreg., probably the survivors of those mentioned by Lewis and Clark. (L. F.)

Wappinger ('easterners,' from the same root as Abnaki, q. v.). A confederacy of Algonquian tribes, formerly occupying the E. bank of Hudson r. from Poughkeepsie to Manhattan id. and the country extending E. beyond Connecticut r., Conn. They were closely related to the Mahican on the N. and the Delawares on the S. According to Rutenber their totem was the wolf. They were divided into 9 tribes: Wappinger proper, Manhattan, Wecquaesgeek, Sintink, Kitchawank, Tankiteke, Nochpeem, Siwanoy, and Mattabesec. Some of these were again divided into subtribes. The eastern bands never came into collision with the Connecticut settlers. Gradually selling their lands as they dwindled away before the whites, they finally joined the Indians at Scaticook and Stockbridge; a few of them also emigrated to Canada. The western bands became involved in war with the Dutch in 1640, which lasted five years, and is said to have cost the lives of 1,600 Indians, of whom the Wappinger proper were the principal sufferers. Notwithstanding this, they kept up their regular succession of chiefs and continued to occupy a tract along the shore in Westchester co., N. Y., until 1756, when most of those then remaining, together with some Mahican from the same region, joined the Nanticoke, then living under Iroquois protection at Chenango, near the present Binghamton, N. Y., and, with them, were finally merged into the Delawares. Their last public appearance was at the Easton conference in 1758. Some of them also joined the Moravian and Stockbridge Indians, while a few were still in Dutchess co. in 1774.

They had the following villages: Alipconk, Canopus, Cupheag, Keskistkonk, Kestabuinck, Kitchawank, Mattabesec, Menunkatuc, Nappeckamak, Naugatuck, Nipinichsen, Nochpeem, Ossingsing, Pasquasheck, Pauguseet, Pauquaunuch, Pomperaug, Poningo, Poodatook, Poquannoc, Pyquang, Quinnipiac, Rechtauck. Roatan, Sackhoes, Sapohanikan, Senasqua, Tunxis, Turkey Hill, Uncowa, Wecquaesgeek, Wongunk, Woronock. (J. M.)

Wappo (from Span. guapo, 'brave'). A small detached portion of the Yukian family of N. California, separated from the Huchnom, the nearest Yuki division, by 30 or 40 m. of Pomo territory. They lived chiefly in the mountains separating Sonoma from Lake and Napa cos., between Geysers and Calistoga. A portion of them, called Rincons by Powers, occupied Russian River valley in the vicinity of Healdsburg.

War and War discipline. The Indians recognized two kinds of warfare, to which they gave distinctive names: defensive warfare, or fighting for the protection of women and children, the home and the village, and aggressive war, or the going forth of expeditions to avenge injuries or to take spoils. The aim of warfare was to destroy, and as every person, old or young, was a part of the present or future strength of the enemy, neither age nor sex was spared and no noncombatants were recognized. Mutilation of the dead was neither universal nor constant among the tribes, but the cutting off of the head or taking of the scalp was generally practised. The fundamental reason for scalping (q. v.) has not yet been fully explained, but there is evidence to indicate that it was connected with the rites observed when a boy was recognized as a member of the band and his life was dedicated to the God of War. The ordinary physical training of young men fitted them to endure the discipline and hardships of war. From the time he determined to join a war party the man was obliged to abstain from all personal indulgence, and to accept whatever duty might be prescribed by the leader until the disbanding of the party on its return home.

There were grades and ranks among warriors, each having its peculiar insignia. All rank was gained by personal achievement, but before a man could count his war honors, wear their appropriate insignia, or assume the grade or rank to which they entitled him, he had to be given the right to do so publicly and generally in connection with more or less elaborate religious ceremonies, conducted by societies or by tribal officials. Among some tribes honors won in defensive warfare ranked higher than those gained in aggressive ventures. As war honors were public tokens of a man's courage and ability, they were regarded as his credentials; therefore when a man was called to any position or service, either social or tribal, custom required that before he entered on his duties he should give his public record by counting his honors in order to show his fitness to receive the distinction offered him. Among some tribes, at the telling of each honor a blow was struck on a post or some other object, and this form of recital has become known by the composite term "counting coup" (see Coup).

The treatment of captives (q. v.) varied among the different tribes. Adoption (q. v.) was common to nearly all, particularly in the disposal of women and children. Although the life of a captive was generally regarded as forfeit, yet among many tribes there were ways by which either a captive could save his own life or it could be saved by members of the tribe.

Among some tribes there was a particular village or clan that had the right to shelter or protect a fugitive; among others the chief's tent afforded asylum, or if food was offered and taken the captive was spared; others subjected captives to ordeals (q. v.) which if the captive survived he was saved. In most cases the survivors were finally adopted by their captors. Exchange of captives between tribes was of rare occurrence. Some tribes had a war chief whose duties pertained exclusively to war. When an attack, either offensive or defensive, was made which involved the entire tribe, the war chief led the warriors. War parties, however, were composed wholly of volunteers, and were organized solely for aggressive warfare. They varied in size from half a dozen men to a hundred or more. Large parties which intended going a considerable distance from home were attended by hunters, whose duty it was to keep the warriors supplied with game. Occasionally a few women were of the party: they were not under orders, but acted as servers, and when the spoils were divided they were given a share. The initiation and organization of a war party for offensive warfare differed among the tribes, as did the religious rites which preceded its departure. Among the Pueblos these rites were in charge of a war priesthood; in all tribes the rites were more or less directly under the men to whom were confided the keeping of rituals and the direction of ceremonies related to war. In general, a man had to prepare for the office of leader by fasting and continence, and as upon him rested the responsibility of the failure or success of the party, he must be careful to observe all the rites by which he could personally appeal to the supernatural. He assigned the men to their various duties, and to him each man had to render implicit obedience: any refusal to carry out the orders of the leader was punished by flogging. He appointed two lieutenants, or "little leaders," who, in case of his death, should act in his place. Frequently, however, a war party had two leaders, equal in authority. In battle the warriors were not required to keep close together except when making a charge, but while each man fought more or less independently, friend stood by friend to death, and only under great stress was the body of a companion left to the knife of the victor. Frequently the severest fighting took place about the body of a fallen comrade. The leader exercised no control over the men in regard to taking honors, such as touching, striking, or scalping an enemy: each man was free to take all the honors he could, but only the leader had the right to divide the spoils, and no one could question his apportionment. Not infrequently a war party carried some article sacred to the band, and rites connected with it had to be observed. In such cases the responsibility of the outcome of the expedition was believed to rest with this emblem. The warrior societies of several of the Plains tribes possessed a particular object similar in use to the ceremonial lance of the Kiowa. This was attached by an elk-skin sash to the neck of the leader, who under certain circumstances took his place in front of his line of warriors, and thrusting the lance into the ground through a hole in the end of the sash, there fought or awaited death: he could not retreat unless one of his own party should pull up the lance to which he was in honor fixed (Mooney). Dreams (q. v.) sometimes influenced the acts of a war party. Instances have been known where, because of a dream, the entire party has disbanded and returned home. There were grades or ranks among warriors, each having its peculiar insignia, and all rank was gained by personal achievement. In defensive warfare the warriors sprang to the alarm and aimed to engage the enemy beyond the limits of the village, while the women hastily threw up breastworks or dug pits in which to thrust the children out of reach of flying arrows. Women fought only at close range, using their knives or any available objects as weapons; but in rare cases women went to war and fought on equal terms with the men of the party. Prisoners, particularly if women or children, were frequently adopted, otherwise they were killed. The club, knife, spear, javelin, and bow and arrows were the Indian's principal weapons; the throwing-stick had only a limited range. Poisoned arrows are reported as having been used by a number of the tribes, and while the poison itself was sometimes effective, the main reliance was on the theurgical potency of the substances used.

Ward, Nancy. A noted Cherokee half-breed woman, the date and place of whose birth and death are alike unknown. It is said that her father was a British officer named Ward and her mother a sister of Atakullakulla, principal chief of the Nation at the time of the first Cherokee war. She was probably related to Brian Ward, an oldtime trader among the Cherokee. During the Revolutionary period she resided at Echota, the national capital, where she held the office of "Beloved Woman," or "Pretty Woman," by virtue of which she was entitled to speak in councils and to decide the fate of captives. She distinguished herself by her constant friendship for the Americans, always using her best effort to bring about peace between them and her own people, and frequently giving timely warning of projected Indian raids, notably on the occasion of the great invasion of the Watauga and Holston settlements in 1776. A Mrs Bean, captured during this incursion, was saved by her interposition after having been condemned to death and already bound to the stake. In 1780, on occasion of another Cherokee outbreak, she assisted a number of traders to escape, and the next year was sent by the chiefs to make peace with Sevier and Campbell, who were advancing against the Cherokee towns. Campbell speaks of her in his report as "the famous Indian woman, Nancy Ward." Although peace was not then granted, her relatives, when brought in later with other prisoners, were treated with the consideration due in return for her good offices. She is described by Robertson, who visited her about this time, as "queenly and commanding" in appearance and manner, and her house as furnished in accordance with her high dignity. When among the Arkansas Cherokee in 1819, Nuttall was told that she had introduced the first cows into the Nation, and that by her own and her children's influence the condition of the Cherokee had been greatly elevated. He was told also that her advice and counsel bordered on the supreme, and that her interference was allowed to be decisive even in affairs of life and death. Although he speaks in the present tense, it is hardly probable that she was then still alive, and he does not claim to have met her. Her descendants are still found in the Nation. Consult Haywood, Nat. and Aborig. Hist. Warm Spring Apache. So called from their former residence at the Ojo Caliente, or Warm Spring, in s. w. N. Mex., near the extreme headwaters of Gila r. They were evidently Chiricahua Apache in the main, and were probably the Apaches de Xila (Gileños) of Benavides in 1630. Victorio and Nana were among their noteworthy leaders in recent times. Some of them are on the Mescalero res., N. Mex.

Warm Springs Indians. A term used to denote the different tribes resident on Warm Springs res., Oreg., most of whom were placed there under the Wasco treaty of 1855. The chief tribes of the reservation are Wasco, Paiute, Tenino, and Tyigh. The number on the reservation was 780 in 1910, while about 80 others are reported to be permanently absent from the reservation. (L. F.)

Wascacug. A village on the E. bank of Patuxent r. in Calvert co., Md., in 1608.—Smith (1629), Va., 1, map, repr. 1819.

Wasco (from the Wasco word wacy'ô, 'cup or small bowl of horn,' the reference being to a cup-shaped rock a short distance from the main village of the tribe; from the tribal name Galacy'ô, 'Those that belong to Wasco,' or 'Those that have the cup,' are derived many of the forms of the name that follow in the synonymy. The derivation of the name from the Shahaptian wask'û, 'grass,' lacks probability). A Chinookan tribe formerly living on the s. side of Columbia r., in the neighborhood of The Dalles, in Wasco co., Oreg. This tribe, with the Wishram (also known as Tlakuut and Echeloot), on the N. side of the river, were the easternmost branches of the Chinookan family. These two tribes were practically identical in language and culture, though they have been removed to different reservations. On the N., E., and S. they bordered on Shahaptian tribes, on the W. on closely related Chinookan tribes (White Salmon and Hood River Indians, Mooney's Chiluktkwa and Kwikwulit). Morse, in 1822, estimated the number of the Wasco at 900. They joined in the treaty of 1855, and removed to the Warm Springs res., Oreg., where about 200 now reside. The Wasco occupied a number of villages, some of these being used only for wintering during the salmon runs. The names of these villages and fishing stations from E. to W. are: Hlgahacha, Igiskhis, Wasko (a few miles above the present town of The Dalles), Wogupan, Natlalalaik, Gawobumat, Hliekala-imadik, Wikatk, Watsokus, Winkwot (at The Dalles), Hliilwa-ibldik, Hliapkenun, Kabala, Gayahisitik, Itkumahlemkt, Hlgaktablk, Tgahu, Hliiluktik, Gahlentlich, Gechgechak, Skhlalia.

The Wasco were a sedentary people, depending for their subsistence mainly upon fish (several varieties of salmon, suckers, sturgeon, eels), to a less extent upon edible roots, berries, and, least important of all, game. Salmon were caught in the spring and fall, partly with dip-nets, partly by spearing; smaller fish were obtained with hook and line or by means of basket traps. Definitely located fishing stations were a well-recognized form of personal property; the capture of the first salmon of the season was accompanied with a ceremony intended to give that particular fishing station a good season's catch. Pounded salmon flesh was often stored away for winter use; it also formed an important article of trade with neighboring tribes, the chief rendezvous for barter being the falls a few miles above The Dalles. Also berries were dried and preserved for winter use. The most notable of their industries were work in wood (bowls, spoons), horn (spoons, cups), and twined basketry (bags, various forms of stiff baskets). Coiled basketry has been learned since closer contact with the Klikitat; the chief materials used in twining are cedar roots and various grasses, of late also trader's cord and yarn. Realistic figures are carved in wood and horn; while the basket designs are partly geometrical, recalling the basketry art of N. California, and, as in that area, bearing conventional pattern names, partly realistic, though crudely so (angular figures of men, eagles, and deer are characteristic of the basketry art of the lower Columbia). The latter designs may be plausibly explained as an adaptation of forms familiar from wood-carving to twined basketry with its straight line and angular patterns. The original Wasco costume consisted of blanket robes (the pelts of bear, deer, wolf, coyote, raccoon, and mountain goat in summer), sleeveless shirts of raccoon or coyote skin, breechcloths of raccoon skin, and moccasins of deerskin; hats and gloves were made of coyote skin. Two types of house were in use—the partly underground winter house, roofed with cedar bark and having board platforms about the walls for beds, and the summer house with frame of fir poles and covering of tules or cedar bark; the latter type might have several fireplaces, accommodating three or four families. Sweat-houses were frequently used and were of quasi-supernatural significance.

In childhood the head was flattened by pressure on the forehead, and the ears were punctured with five holes in each ear; adults whose heads were not flattened were derided as no better than slaves. As regards naming, the most interesting fact is perhaps the absolute impossibility of translating a single Wasco name, the Chinookan dialects differing in this respect from the vast majority of American languages. Puberty ceremonies were observed in the case of both girls and boys; the former were subject to the usual taboos, after the fulfillment of which a menstrual dance was held, while the latter "trained" for the acquirement of strength and one or several guardian spirits. Burial was on boards put away in "dead people's houses"; slaves were sometimes buried alive to accompany a chief to the next world. Three classes of society were recognized: chiefs (the chieftainship was hereditary), common folk, and slaves (obtained by capture). There was no clan or totem organization, the guardian spirits referred to being strictly personal in character; the village was the main social unit. Religious ideas centered in the acquirement and manifestation of supernatural power obtained from one or more guardian spirits. The main social dances were the menstrual dance, the guardian spirit dance, in which each participant sang the song revealed to him by his protector, and the scalp dance. The most striking fact in the mythology of the tribe is the great rôle that Coyote plays as culture-hero and transformer. See Sapir, Wishram Texts, Pub. Amer. Ethnol. Soc., II, 1909. (E. S.)

Wascoo. Given by Ker (Trav., 104, 1816) as the chief village of the "Ilisees" (q. v.).

Wasechun-tashunka. See American Horse.

Washa. A small tribe, probably of Muskogean stock, which, when first known to Europeans, inhabited the lower part of Bayou Lafourche, La., and hunted through the country between that river and the Mississippi. In 1699 Bienville made an unsuccessful attempt to open relations with them, but in 1718, after the close of the Chitimacha war, they were induced to settle on the Mississippi 3 leagues above New Orleans, and they appear to have remained near that place to the time of their extinction or their absorption by other tribes. They were always closely associated with another small tribe called Chaouacha, with which they finally became united. In 1805 Sibley stated that there were only four individuals of this tribe living scattered among various French families. The name Ouacha is perpetuated in that of a lake near the Louisiana coast, and it also appears as an alternative name for L. Salvador. (J. E. S.)

Washakie ('shoots [the buffalo] running.'—Corbusier. It is also said that the name means 'gambler's gourd,' and that its bearer was originally known as Pinaquana, meaning 'smell of sugar'). A Shoshoni chief, of mixed Shoshoni and

WASHAKIE

Umatilla blood (according to some authorities he was half white), born about 1804. Before reaching maturity he left the Umatilla and joined his mother's people, the Shoshoni. Washakie was noted chiefly for his friendship toward the whites and as a warrior against his tribal enemies. He early became the chief of the Eastern Band of Shoshoni of Wyoming, known also as Washakie's Band, by reason of his prowess and leadership, but when about 70 years of age some of the younger men aspiring to the chiefship, took steps to depose him. Washakie disappeared from the camp, and two months later, on the night when the council met to take action, he suddenly appeared with six scalps which he had taken alone on the war-path, thus setting at rest all further opposition to his chieftaincy on the ground of age. Washakie is described as having been light in color, of commanding figure, very tall, powerfully built, and of dignified carriage, and had a reputation for great endurance. He realized the importance of his position, and was fond of form and ceremony in his dealings with white people. When in the 50's emigrants passed in large numbers through the Shoshoni country in Wyoming, Washakie and his people exercised great forbearance, following the injunctions of the Government agents to aid overland travelers in recovering strayed or lost stock, helping the emigrants across dangerous fords, and refraining from all acts of reprisal when animals of the white men destroyed the Indian root and herding grounds. So friendly and helpful were Washakie and the members of his band that 9,000 emigrants signed a paper commending their kind treatment. Washakie owed his great popularity among his people to his exploits on the war-path, especially against the Siksika (Blackfeet) and the Crows, and also, it is asserted, because in his younger days he brooked no opposition in the tribe and allowed no asylum to a horse thief or a vagabond. Another war-chief of the Shoshoni, named Pushican, or Purchican, bore on his forehead the scar of a blow from Washakie's tomahawk received during an altercation. He was for many years in the employ of the American and Hudson's Bay fur companies, and was long the valued companion of white hunters and trappers. Before the battle of Bear r. in 1863, in which Gen. Connor defeated the Bannock and hostile Shoshoni who refused to heed Washakie's warning, he fled with the greater portion of his tribe to Ft Bridger, Wyo., thus saving many of his people from destruction. When Ft Brown was established on the site of Lander, Wyo., in 1869, Washakie met the soldiers and avowed his friendship for the whites, and frequently served as a scout in campaigns against the Cheyenne, Sioux, Arapaho, Ute, and other hostile tribes. Members of his band also performed valiant service against the Cheyenne following the Custer defeat in 1876. At the time of his death, Feb. 20, 1900, Washakie was a devout member of the Protestant Episcopal church and a firm friend of the missionaries. He was buried, with military honors, in the cemetery at Ft Washakie, Wyo., where a monument has been erected over his grave. He was succeeded by his son, known as Dick Washakie.

Washakie's Band. The easternmost division of the Shoshoni proper, so called from their chief. They formerly ranged from Wind r. in lat. 43° 30' on the n., in Wyoming, and from South pass to the headwaters of the North Platte on the e., and to Bear r. near the mouth of Smith fork, in Idaho, on the w. On the s. they extended as far as Brown's Hole, on Green r., Wyo. They are known officially as Shoshoni in distinction from the Bannock, Sheepeaters, etc., and were placed upon the Shoshoni res. in w. Wyoming by treaty of 1868. They numbered 870 in 1885, while the Shoshoni under the Shoshoni agency numbered 816 in 1909.

Was-hinedi (Wqs'hī'nedī, 'lousy creek people'). A Tlingit division at Kake, Alaska, belonging to the Wolf phratry. Tradition says a man from Lousy cr. was so infested with vermin that he died, in consequence of which they applied the name to his people. (J. R. S.)

Washo (from washiu, 'person,' in their own language.—Kroeber). A small tribe, forming a distinct linguistic family, the Washoan, which, when first known to Americans, occupied Truckee r., Nev., as far down as the Meadows, though their right to the latter was disputed by the Mono. The Washo also held Carson r. down to the first large canyon below Carson City, the borders of L. Tahoe, and Sierra and other valleys as far as the first range s. of Honey lake, Cal., the mountains being resorted to only in summer. There are some evidences that they once were established in the valleys farther to the e. than where found by the whites, whence they had been driven by the Paiute, between whom and themselves existed a state of chronic ill feeling, breaking out occasionally into open hostility. About 1860–62 the Paiute conquered the Washo in a contest over the site of Carson and forbade them thenceforth to own horses (Mooney). Of late years they have been confined to the country from Reno, on the railroad, to a short distance s. of Carson City, and have adopted a parasitic mode of life, being almost entirely dependent upon the towns and ranches. Recent study of their language indicates no linguistic relationship with any other people. In physique and general appearance they correspond more closely with the California Indians than with the tribes to their eastward. In 1859 the Washo numbered about 900, but are now reduced to about a third of that number. On the language of the Washo, consult Kroeber in Univ. Cal. Pub., Am. Arch. and Eth., IV, no. 5, 1907. (H. Watap. Roots of the pine, spruce, tamarack, etc., used to sew birch-bark for canoes and other purposes: from watap, in the Chippewa and closely related Algonquian dialects, signifying root of the tamarack. The word has come into English through Canadian French. Cuoq (Lex. Alg., 426, 1888) says the word is known from one end of Canada to the other and deserves adoption by the French Academy. (A. F. C.)

Watauga (Wald'gi, of unknown meaning). A name occurring as that of two or more towns in the old Cherokee country; one was an important settlement on Watauga cr., a branch of Little Tennessee r., a few miles below Franklin, in Macon co., N. C.; another was traditionally located at Watauga Old Fields, about the present Elizabethton, on Watauga r., in Carter co., Tenn. The name is also written Watoga, Wattoogee, Whatoga, etc.—Mooney in 19th Rep. B. A. E., 548, 1900.

Watchful Fox. See Kootuk.

Wateres (perhaps from Catawba wateron, 'to float on the water.'—Gatschet). One of the early tribes of the Carolinas, probably Siouan. As described by Juan de la Vanders in his account of the expedition of Juan de Pardo in 1567, they then lived at a great distance from the coast, near the Cherokee frontier. In 1670 Lederer, whose statement is doubtful, places them apparently in North Carolina, on the extreme upper Yalkin, far to the n. w. of their later habitat, with the Shoccore and Eno on the n. e. and the Cheraw on the w. In 1700 they lived on Wateres r., below the present Camden, S. C. On a map of 1715 their village is placed on the w. bank of Wateres r., perhaps in Fairfield co. Moll's map of 1730 locates their village on the e. bank of the river. When Lawson met them, in 1700, they were a much larger body than the Congaree, and spoke an entirely different language, which was unintelligible to the latter people. The Yamasee war broke the power of the Wateres, and according to Adair (1743) they became confederates of the Catawba, though still retaining their own village and language. Vanders says they were ruled by two female chiefs, who held dignified court, with a retinue of young men and women. He also describes them as being rather the slaves than the subjects of their chiefs, which agrees with what Lawson says of the Santee. Lederer, who speaks from hearsay only, mentions the killing of women of a hostile tribe, by a chief, in order that their spirits might serve his dying son in the other world. Lawson says that their houses were as poor as their industry; that the men were tall and well-built, friendly, but great pilferers, and very lazy, even for Indians. Wathatotarho ('he obstinately refused to acquiesce'; also Thadodaho, Tododaho, Atotarho). The official name and title of a chiefship hereditary in the Bear clan of the Onondaga, and heading the roll of federal chiefs. The first known chieftain to bear the name flourished about the year 1570. He was one of the great men of his time and people, who resolutely deferred to the last his assent to the adherence of his tribe to the confederation of peoples then forming, which afterward became famous under the name of the League of the Iroquois, or Five Nations. According to native tradition Wathatotarho possessed great force of character, being haughty, ambitious, crafty, and remorseless, brooking no equal. He was reputed to be a dreaded sorcerer and was even charged with being a cannibal. By taking too literally the figures of speech by which were designated the qualities that made him feared and dreaded by his opponents, tradition assigns to him a preterhuman nature, even representing his head as having been clothed, in lieu of hair, with living vipers, his hands and feet as having the shape of huge turtle-claws, and whose other organs were similarly monstrous in form, in keeping with his demoniacal mind. Hence he is said to have had "seven crooks in his body," referring figuratively to his unnatural hair, hands and feet, eyes, throat, hearing, sexual parts, and mind, but now erroneously taken literally. After the Mohawk, Oneida, and Cayuga had united in a tentative league, they were enabled to gain his assent to the adhesion of the Onondaga to the proposed confederation. By his defiance, however, he obtained for the Onondaga certain concessions, among them being that the league council-fire should be kept at their chief town; that they should have 14 chiefs, while no other tribe should have more than 10; that the federal council should be summoned only by Wathatotarho; that no act of the council would be valid unless sanctioned by the Onondaga speaker as being in accordance with the rules and principles of the league; that Wathatotarho, being the leading chief of the Onondaga tribe, should have four peers assigned to him as special aids; and that the Onondaga, represented by their chiefs, should have confirmatory, arbitral, and advisory functions in the deliberations of the league council. His great antagonists were Dekanawida and Hiawatha, who by wise statecraft finally overcame his opposition. (J. N. B. H.)

Watlala. A division of the Chinookan family formerly living at the cascades of Columbia r. and, at least in later times, on Dog (now Hood) r. about halfway between the cascades and The Dalles, in Wasco co., Oreg. Early writers mention several tribes at or near the cascades, but as the population of that region was very changeable from the fact of its being a much frequented fishing resort, and as many of the so-called tribes were merely villages, often of small size, it is now impossible to identify them with certainty. After the epidemic of 1829, the Watlala seem to have been the only remaining tribe, the remnants of the others having probably united under that name, though they were commonly called Cascade Indians by the whites. In 1854 they were reported to number 80. In 1855 they joined in the Wasco treaty under the name of the "Ki-gal-twal-la band of the Wascoes" and the "Dog River band of the Wascoes," and were removed to the Warm Springs res. in Oregon, where a few still survive.

The term Watlala is also used by some writers, following Hale, to include all the Upper Chinook. The names given by different writers to the tribes living at or near the cascades, which may have been the Watlala or later have been included under them, are Cathlakaheckit, Cathlathlala, Cathlayackty, Clahcclallah, Katlagakya, Yehuh. Watopachnato. A division of the Assiniboin which in 1804, according to Lewis and Clark, roved the plains between the Missouri and the Saskatchewan, above the Yellowstone and the heads of Assiniboine r. They numbered 1,600, including 450 warriors, in 200 tipis, and resembled their congeners, the Watopapinah and the Itscheabine, in their habits and alliances. Hayden estimated them at 100 lodges, averaging 4 persons, in 1862.

Watopapinah ('canoe people'). A band of the Assiniboin which, according to Lewis and Clark in 1804, roved on Mouse (Souris) r. and the branches of the Assiniboine n. of the Mandan tribe, in the United States and Canada. At this period they numbered 450 warriors, in 200 tipis. In 1806 Henry (Coues, New Light, II, 522, 1897) said they had 160 lodges, while Hayden (Ethnog. and Philol. Mo. Val., 387, 1862) in 1856 said that they ranged from White Earth r. to the sources of the Souris and Pembina rs. and occupied 220 lodges, averaging 4 persons.

WAUMEGESAKO. E. WAMPUM. FROM A PAINTING IN POSSESSION OF THE WISCONSIN HISTORICAL SOCIETY.

Waumegesako (Wemigisked, 'He who makes the migis, or sacred shell,' i. e. 'Sacred-shell maker.'—J. A. Gilfillan. Also known as The Wampum, and "Mexico"). A leading Chippewa, born about 1789, head chief of a mixed band of Chippewa, Potawatomi, and Ottawa residing at Manitowoc, Wis., where he died in 1844. He took a prominent part in the treaties of Butte des Morts in 1827, Green Bay in 1828, Prairie du Chien in 1829, and Chicago in 1833. At the last treaty, ratified in 1835, the Indian title was extinguished to all the tract of country commencing at Grosse Point, 9 m. N. of Chicago, to the source of Milwaukee r., thence w. to Rock r. A portrait of Waumegesako was painted by Healey, an Irish artist, in 1839, a copy of which is in the collection of the Wisconsin Historical Society. In appreciation of his friendly attitude toward the early settlers, the citizens of Manitowoc have erected a monument to Waumegesako's memory.

Wauregan. A word of frequent occurrence in the earlier literature of New England. Bartlett (Dict. of Americanisms, 741, 1877) states that it was still local in and about Norwich, Conn., in the sense of fine or showy. The word is famous through Dr Eliza Tracy's epitaph on the tombstone of Uncas, the Mohegan sachem:

"For courage bold, for things wauregan,
He was the glory of Mohegan."

Wauregan, according to Gerard, is a corrupt form of wurigen, an inanimate adjective (of which the animate form is wurigu) belonging to an R-dialect of New England, and meaning 'it is good (fine, pretty, etc.)'; cognate with Massachusetts wunigen, Lenape (Delaware) wutigen, etc. As a place name the word survives in Wauregan, a village in Windham co., Conn. (A. F. C.)

Wauswagimig (Waswagaming, 'at the torchlight fishing lake.'—Gerard). A Chippewa band that lived on the present Lac de Flambeau res. in Wisconsin, on Lac de Flambeau, where they were accustomed to fish by torchlight.

Lac du Flambeau.—Treaty of 1854 in U. S. Stat. at Large, x, 223, 1855. Waswagaming.—Wm. Jones, Inf'n, 1905 (correct name). Was-waw-gun-sink.—James in Tanner, Narr., 261, 1830. Waus-wag-imig.—Warren (1852) in Minn. Hist. Soc. Coll., v, 192, 1885.

Wauteghe (Waut'ghe). A village about 1750, on the upper Susquehanna, between Teatontaloga and Oquaga.—Hawley (1754) in Mass. Hist. Soc. Coll., 1st s., iv, 63, 1795.

Wavey. A Canadian French corruption of wehew, the Cree (onomatopoeitic) name of the snow goose, Chen hyperboreus, called by the Chippewa wewe. The snow goose is also distinguished as the "common wavey, or wavy", and the "white wavey", while the blue-winged goose (C. carulescens) is known as the "blue-wavey", and the smallest goose (C. rossii) as the "horned wavey". The flying to the south of the wavey in large flocks is regarded by the Indians as a sure sign of approaching winter. (W. R. G.)

Wawarsink (possibly from wawdräsnikew, 'many hollow stones,' referring to stones hollowed out by the action of the creek.—Gerard). A former Munsee (?) band on the w. bank of the lower Hudson r., N. Y., having their principal settlement of the same name about the junction of Wawarsing with Rondout cr., in Ulster co. (J. M.)

Wawarasinke.—Doc. of 1685 quoted by Ruttenber, Ind. Geog. Names, 166, 1906. Wawarsing.—Ruttenber, Tribes Hudson R., 392, 1872. Wawarsinks.—Ibid., 95.

Wawayontat.—Bourne (1674) in Mass. Hist. Soc. Coll., 1st s., 1, 198, 1806. Wawayoutat.—Bourne (1674), quoted by Drake, Bk. Inds., bk. II, 118, 1848.

Wawepex. A Matinecoc village formerly near the present Cold Spring, near Oyster Bay, on the n. shore of Long Id., N. Y.—Thompson, Long Id., 1, 501, 1843.

Wawikyem (Wā'urik'em). A clan of the Wikenos, a Kwakiutl tribe.—Boas in Rep. U. S. Nat. Mus. 1895, 328, 1897.

Wawnahton. See Waneta.

Wawyachtonoc ('eddy people', or possibly 'people of the curving channel.' Cf. Wea). A tribe or band of the Mahican confederacy formerly occupying a territory in Dutchess and Columbia cos., N. Y., extending to the Housatonic r. in Litchfield co., Conn. Their principal village was Weantinock. Shecomeco, Wechquadnach, Pomperaug, Bantam, Weataug, and Scaticook were villages of this tribe or in alliance with it. Most of these Indians were gathered by the Moravians into the missions at Shecomeco and Scaticook, Conn., and, except some who remained at Scaticook, removed to Pennsylvania and shared the fortunes of the Moravian Indians. (J. M.)

Wawijachtenocks.—Doc. of 1689 quoted by Ruttenber, Tribes Hudson R., 85, 1872. Wawyachteioks.—Doc. of 1689, ibid., 85. Wawyachtonocks.—Ibid. Wayoughtanock.—Caldwell (1702), ibid. Wyeck.—Wassenaar (1632) quoted by Ruttenber, ibid., 71.

Waxhaw. A small tribe that lived in the 17th century in what is now Lancaster co., S. C., and Union and Mecklenburg cos., N. C. They were connected with the neighboring Sugeree, and both were apparently related to the Catawba, and therefore were Siouan. The custom of flattening the head, practised by the Waxhaw, was also mentioned as a custom of the Catawba. Lederer (1672) says they were subject to and might be considered a part of the Catawba. Lawson visited the Waxhaw in 1701 and was hospitably received. He mentions two of their villages situated about 10 m. apart. He describes the people as very tall, and notes particularly their custom of artificially flattening the head during infancy. The dance ceremonies and councils were held in a council house, much larger than the ordinary dwellings. Instead of being covered with bark, like the domiciles, it was neatly thatched with sedge and rushes; the entrance was low, and around the walls on the inside were benches made of cane. Near the Waxhaw were the Catawba, or more likely a band of that tribe. They were probably so reduced by the Yamasee war of 1715 as to have been obliged to incorporate with the Catawba. See Mooney, Siouan Tribes of the East, 1894.

Flatheads.—Mooney, Siouan Tribes of the E., 68, 1894 (general name, applied also to the Catawba).

'plenty of lodge poles'). Wag-sha—Hayden, Ethnog. and Philol. Mo. Val., 371, 1892. Wag-sha—Schoolcraft, Ind. Tribes, II, 109, 1852.

Wea (probably a contraction of the local name Wawaqtenang, 'place of the round, or curved, channel' (Schoolcraft); possibly contracted from Wawaktonuk, 'eddy people,' from wawaktonuk, 'eddy,' both renderings coming from the same root. Wawaqtenang was the common Algonquian name for Detroit. Cf. Wawaktonuk). A subtribe of the Miami. They are first mentioned in the Jesuit Relation for 1673 as living in s. Wisconsin. In the later distribution of the tribes of the confederacy they occupied the most westerly position. Allouez in 1680 found a Wea town on St. Joseph r., Ind. Marquette visited a Wea village at Chicago which Courtemanche found still there in 1701. A part of them were for a time with the bands of various tribes gathered about La Salle's fort near Peoria, Ill. La Salle says their band had 35 cabins. In 1719 their chief village, Ouatenon, was on the Wabash, below the mouth of Wea cr., where, according to Charlevoix, they were living nearly half a century before. This is possibly identical with "Les Gros" village (q. v.) of a document of 1718. Besides this they had two or three villages near by. Ouatenon was one of the principal headquarters of the French traders. In 1757 the Wea and Piankashaw endeavored to come into friendly relations with the whites, and an agreement to this end was entered into with Col. George Croghan, but was rejected by the assembly of Virginia. Subsequently various agreements of peace with other tribes and the whites were entered into, chiefly through the efforts of Col. Croghan and Sir Wm. Johnson, to be as often followed by outbreaks. In 1791 their neighboring villages were destroyed by the U. S. troops under Gen. Scott. They participated in the treaty of Greenville, Ohio, Aug. 3, 1795, their deputies signing for them and the Piankashaw. In 1820 they sold their last lands in Indiana, near the mouth of Raccoon cr. in Parke co., and removed with the Piankashaw to Illinois and Missouri. In 1832 the united tribes in turn sold their claims in those states and removed to Kansas, where some had already settled. The few Wea still remaining in Indiana afterward joined them there. In 1864 the Wea and Piankashaw, having rapidly dwindled away, joined the remnants of the cognate Illinois, then known as the Peoria and Kaskaskia. The united body, all that remained of 7 tribes, then numbered but 259, a large proportion of whom were of mixed blood. In 1868 they removed to a tract on Neosho r., in the n. e. corner of the present Oklahoma, where they now are. In 1885 the united tribes numbered 149 souls. In 1909 the number of the confederated Peoria was 304, only about 75 of whom had as much as one-half Indian blood. (J. M.)

Weakaote (probably from wiyaka ota, 'much sand'). A former band or vil-lage of the Mdewakanton Sioux.—Long, Exped. St Peters R., I, 385, 1824.

Weanoc. A tribe of the Powhatan confederacy, formerly living in Charles City co., Va., on the n. bank of James r. In 1608 they numbered about 500. They seem to have crossed over to the s. bank of James r. toward the close of the 17th century, perhaps in consequence of a dis-astrous attack from the Iroquois in 1687. In 1722 Beverley stated that their former settlement in Prince George co., s. of the James, was extinct, and in 1727 it was stated that they had lived at different times on upper Nottoway r. and on a tributary stream, then called Wyanoke cr., near the North Carolina frontier. Nottoway r. was also at one time known by their name.

Weapemeoc. An Algonquian (?) tribe met by Raleigh's colonists in 1584-89, occupying the territory n. of Albemarle sd., N. C., including probably most of what is now Currituck, Camden, Pasquo-tank, and Perquimans cos. Their chief town, of the same name, seems to have been in Pasquotank co. Other towns apparently in the same jurisdiction were Pasquenock (Pasquotank?), Chepanoc, and Mascoming. They were said then to have 700 or 800 (warriors), under their chief Okisco. A century later the same territory was occupied by the Yeopim or Jaupim (Weapom-oc?), Pasquotank, Perquiman, and Poteskeet. In 1662 the Yeopim chief sold lands. In 1701, according to Lawson, the other bands still counted 40 warriors, but of the Yeopim only one man survived. (J. M.)

Weapons. The offensive weapons of the Indians may be classified by their working parts and hafting, and their use. Striking weapons are of stone, bone, or wood, in the shape of clubs or balls, and into the shapes of the clubs the tribes carved a marvelous amount of their mythology, especially those among whom tractable wood was abundant; cutting weapons, before the introduction of iron, were made of stone or copper; piercing weapons were of any hard substance that would take a point. Many weapons had two or more functions. The Sioux had clubs armed with blades or points; among other tribes cutting or thrusting weapons were weighted. All three classes are subdivided according to the manner of holding or mounting. They were held in the hand, perhaps wrapped with a strip of fur, set in a grip for one hand, mounted on a longer shaft for two hands, or slung to a line. Missile weapons were thrown from a sling, darted from a throwing-stick, hurled from the hand, or shot from a bow. Not all these were equally common. The chisel-edged arrow of Africa was almost unknown in the Western Hemisphere. Piercing implements for hunting were often combined with a device for holding the quarry, and the Mexicans are said to have shot the soldiers of Cortés with harpoon arrows thrown from atlatls; but war arrows had lanceolate, not barbed points. The war arrow also had a single head. The poisoning of arrows is a much mooted question.

The most common defensive weapon of the North Americans was the shield, worn on the left arm by means of thongs fastened on the inside and used both for parrying and for covering the vitals. Shields were usually circular in form and made of the thickest rawhide, though bark, basketry, and rods woven together served the purpose here and there. The making of a shield, for which one or more covers were prepared, was attended with great ceremony. On the surface were painted heraldic devices, and the shield was further adorned with fringes, precious objects, tassels, and the plumes of eagles. A special place was set apart for it in or about the tent.

Armor was not universal and was of two sorts: (1) woven of rods or splints of wood or of plates of ivory; (2) made of thick rawhide. From Bering str. southward all varieties are found. There is historic evidence of skin armor on the Atlantic slope. The fighting of the Indians was chiefly hand to hand, hence there was little need of engineering inventions or coöperative weapons demanding the united effort of a number of men. See Armor, Arrows, Clubs, Daggers, Knives, Lances, Poisons, Shields, Slings, Spears, Throwing-stick, Tomahawk, etc. (O. T. M.)

Weataug. A village formerly near the site of the present Salisbury, Litchfield co., Conn., containing 70 wigwams in 1740. Its inhabitants were probably a part of the Mahican.

Weatherford, William (known also as Lamochattee, or Red Eagle). A half-blood Creek chief, born about 1780; noted for the part he played in the Creek war of 1812-14, in which Gen. Jackson was leader of the American forces. There is some uncertainty as to his parentage. Claiborne (quoted by Drake, Inds. N. Am., 388, 1860) says his "father was an itinerant peddler, sordid, treacherous, and revengeful; his mother a full-blooded savage of the tribe of the Seminoles." Another authority says that a trader, Scotch or English, named Charles Weatherford (believed to have been the father of William), married a half-sister of Alexander McGillivray (q. v.), who was the daughter of an Indian chief of pure blood. In person he was tall, straight, and well proportioned, and nature had bestowed upon him genius, eloquence, and courage, but his moral character was far from commendable. He led the 1,000 Creeks at the massacre of Ft Mimms, Aug. 30, 1813. Gen. Jackson having entered the field, the Creeks were driven from point to point until Weatherford resolved to make a desperate effort to retrieve his waning fortunes by gathering all the force he could command at the Great Horseshoe bend of the Tallapoosa. The signal defeat his forces suffered at this point ended the war, and Weatherford, to save further bloodshed, or perhaps shrewdly judging the result, voluntarily delivered himself to Jackson and was released on his promise to use his influence to maintain peace. He died Mar. 9, 1824, leaving many children, who intermarried with the whites. It is said that after the war his character changed, and he became dignified, industrious, and sober. Consult Red Eagle, by G. C. Eggleston, 1878. (C. T.)

hand; baskets, bags, and mats were made without the aid of apparatus. But in the Atlantic states, the Aleutian is., and doubtless elsewhere, the warp of wallets was suspended from limbs of trees or some other support, thus constituting the first step toward the loom. The Chilkat of S. E. Alaska, in setting up the warp for their elaborate blankets, drove two forked stakes into the ground as far apart as the width of the blanket and laid a stout bar or pole across for a warp beam. From this was suspended a strong or stout cord stretched from side to side, which held the warp of goats' hair and cedar bark. The woman, sitting in front, wrought her intricate patterns with her fingers alone, as does the basket maker, using neither shuttle, heckle, batten, or other device. The technic in many varieties of twined weaving involved two or more weft strands. The designs were in black, white, yellow, blue, and green, first sketched out in black on a pattern board. Further S., in the Columbia drainage basin, fine blankets were woven after the same technic, but they were rectangular in form, lacking the elaborate fringes and borders of the Chilkat, and the decorations were geometrical.

In the E. at the time of the discovery and later in the Pacific states the Indians were found weaving into blankets feathers and down of birds as well as rabbit skins cut into narrow strips. The strips of skin were twisted into rolls as thick as a finger, and the shafts of feathers were caught between the strands of twine in twisting. These fluffy rolls constituted a kind of warp, held in place by rows of twined weaving of stout cord or babiche. In the S. W. the Spaniards introduced sheep and probably taught the Indians the use of European hand looms. With these the Pueblo tribes and the Navaho developed a genuine native art, producing narrow garters, belts, girths, and sashes, and, by different processes, larger fabrics, such as dresses and blankets. In these fabrics, as well as in all others produced in this area, the length of the web was that of the article to be produced; no cloth was made in the piece to be afterward cut up. Cotton, yucca, mulberry bark, and other fibers, hair of quadrupeds, and the down of birds formerly furnished the materials for purely native fabrics. A slender rod with a circular block for a fly-wheel served for spindle. Variety in color was given by the native hue of the materials and with dyes. The setting up of the warp was a combination of the Chilkat process and that of the conquerors. The Zuñi even adopted the western European hand heckle. In the S. the woman in weaving also sat on the ground in front of her work, using little balls of yarn tied to the warp or a simple bobbin for a shuttle. See Art, Basketry, Clothing, Dyes and Pigments, Ornament.

The intricate processes with crude apparatus are discussed and illustrated by Matthews in 3d Rep. B. A. E., 1884. Consult also Mason in Nat. Mus. Wechikhit. A Yokuts (Mariposan) tribe formerly living on lower Kings r., Cal., in the plains, and one of the group of tribes which ceded their lands to the United States by treaty of Apr. 29, 1851. They were then placed on Fresno res., where they were still represented in 1861. Two or three individuals survive.

Wechotookme (We-cho-took-me). One of the 7 Seminole towns in Florida in 1799; exact locality unknown.—Hawkins (1799), Sketch, 25, 1848.

Wechquadnach (properly Wequae'adnauke, 'place at the end of, or extending to, the mountain'; the earlier name was Pachquadnach, 'bare mountain land.'—Trumbull). A Mahican village, probably belonging to the Wawychtonoc tribe, formerly near Indian pond, N. W. of Sharon, Litchfield co., Conn., adjoining the New York state line. The Moravians had a mission there about 1744. (J. M.)

Wechquetank (wechquittank or wiquittank, the Lenape name of a shrub which grew near that vicinity.—Heckewelder). A Delaware village about 8 m. beyond the Blue Ridge, N. W. from Bethlehem, probably near the present Mauch Chunk in Carbon co., Pa. It was settled in 1760 by a colony of Moravian Indians from the mission of Nain. They were driven off by the whites and their village burned in 1763. (J. M.)

Wecquaesgeek (from wikwasik, 'end of the marsh, or swamp.'—Gerard). An important tribe of the Wappinger confederacy that formerly occupied S. Fairfield co., Conn., and Westchester co., N. Y., from about Norwalk, Conn., to Hudson r. They were a strong tribe until they had trouble with the Dutch. In 1643 the Dutch massacred more than 100 in a single night, and in the war which ensued two of their three fortified villages were destroyed. In a massacre near Greenwich, Conn., a party led by Underhill killed between 500 and 700 men, women, and children of the Wecquaesgeek and Wappinger, only 8 men escaping. Peace was finally concluded in 1644. In 1663 their single remaining "castle" contained about 400 souls. The tribe still had a chief as late as 1689. Their castles are said to have been very strong, constructed of plank 5 in. thick, 9 ft high, and braced around with thick plank, pierced with portholes. One of their villages was Alipconk, another bore the name of the tribe. See Rechtsauck. (J. M.)

Wedges. Wedges were probably in most general use among the woodworking tribes of the far N. W. They are made of wood, stone, bone, antler, and copper, but of late years iron and steel have come into favor. These implements are employed in cutting out and splitting lumber for house and boat building, for firewood, and for other purposes. Wedges resemble celts and chisels in general shape, but are not so carefully finished and necessarily show the effect of battering from use under the hammer or maul. The heads of wooden wedges are sometimes protected by a cap of tough withes or spruce roots. Besides the woodworking wedges small wedges of various materials were in common use for tightening fastenings of implement hafts and for like purposes. See Woodwork.

Weendigo ('cannibal'). A mythical tribe of cannibals said by the Chippewa and Ottawa to inhabit an island in Hudson bay. Some of the Chippewa who dwelt on the n. w. shore of L. Superior were said to practise cannibalism and were called by this name. The Maskegon on the shores of Hudson bay, though reproached as cannibals by the other tribes, were said to be themselves in constant fear of the Weendigo.

Weitspekan Family. A linguistic family consisting of the Yurok (q. v.) tribe alone, inhabiting the lower Klamath r. valley and the adjacent coast in N. California. The name is an adaptation of Weitspus (q. v.).

Weitspus (from Weitspekio, the name of a spring in the village.—Kroeber). A Yurok village on lower Klamath r., opposite the mouth of the Trinity, n. w. Cal. This was one of the most populous Yurok villages, and one of only two or three at which both the Deerskin dance and the Jumping dance were held. It is now a post-office under the name of Weitchpec. Including the settlements on the opposite side of the river the Indian population of Weitchpec is now about 100. (A. L. K.)

Wejack. A name of the fisher (Mustela pennanti) formerly in use among the people of the fur country: from otchig or odjik, the name of this animal in the Chipewa dialect of Algonquian, which is also the original of woodchuck (q. v.). With the confusion of names of fisher and marmot may be compared that of the names of the American glutton and the badger, noted under Carcajou. (A. F. C.)

Wejegi (probably from Navaho, bitsigi, 'in its head,' or bitsé'ge, 'among its rocks.'—Matthews). The name given by a New Mexican to Gen. J. H. Simpson in 1850 as that of an important ancient pueblo ruin in Chaco canyon, n. w. N. Mex., about 6 m. s. e. of Pueblo Bonito, on the n. side of the arroyo, at the base of the canyon wall. It is a rectangular structure, 225 by 120 ft in exterior dimensions, built around 3 sides of a court, the s. side of which is open, there being no vestige of an inclosing wall as with other Chaco Canyon pueblos. The rooms average about 8 by 14 ft in size, a few being about 8 ft square. Two circular kivas are embraced within the walls, each being 30 ft in diameter. The building was 3 stories high, and considerable portions of wall are still standing, but no timbers remain in place. The plan of the building is remarkably symmetrical, the masonry regular and well finished. The material is grayish yellow sandstone, laid in small tabular pieces with thin mortar. There are small windows in the second story, below which are apertures 2 by 3 ft in size, extending diagonally through the walls. These appear to have been used for loopholes for the defense of the pueblo. (E. L. H.)

Wekapang ('at the end of the pond.'—Trumbull). The principal village of the eastern Niantic, formerly about the site of Charlestown, R. I. Variants of the name are Wekapang, Wequapang, Wequapauock, etc.

Wickabaug.—Chase cited by Kinnicutt, Ind. Names, 95, 1905.

Wekeponall. A Delaware village in 1758, on the w. bank of the Susquehanna, about the mouth of Loyalsock cr., in the present Lycoming co., Pa. (Post, Jour., 1758, 189, 1904). Probably identical with Queen Esther's Town.

Welagamika ('rich soil'). A Delaware village on the site of Nazareth, Lehigh co., Pa., abandoned about 1748.

Welagamika.—Heckewelder in Trans. Am. Philos. Soc., n. s., IV, 359, 1834. Welakamika.—Ibid., 383.

Welika (Creek: ú-i 'water', läika 'extending' or 'sitting'). A former Seminole town, 4 m. e. of the Tallahassee towns, probably in Leon co., Fla.—H. R. Ex. Doc. 74 (1823), 19th Cong., 1st sess., 27, 1826.

Welsh Indians. According to a story of the Welsh bards, first printed in Lloyd's History of Cambria in 1584, a certain Prince Madoc of Wales in the year 1170 sailed westward and discovered a new land. Returning to Wales he fitted out a second squadron, which sailed away and was never heard of again. Although the story is lacking in detail or corroborating evidence, its romantic side appealed strongly to Welsh national pride, while on the political side it was eagerly seized to offset in a measure the Spanish claims of priority in American discovery, so that it has been perpetuated and constantly amplified for the last 3 centuries by a succession of writers, who have built up a tribe of "Welsh Indians" on the flimsiest theories until the extension of linguistic investigation has left no resting place on the entire continent for this mythic people. The first discovery of a tribe of Welsh Indians, in this case the Tuscarora of North Carolina, was announced by the Rev. Morgan Jones, who claimed to have been taken prisoner by the Tuscarora, who spared his life when they heard him pray in the Welsh language, which they said was the same as their own. His story was published in the Turkish Spy about 1730 and in the Gentleman's Magazine in 1740, and was widely copied and commented on. In 1768 another Welshman, Rev. Charles Beatty (Journal of a Tour in America), enlarged the story by giving these Indians a Welsh Bible, which they were unable to read, but which their prisoner read and explained to them in the Welsh language to their great edification. About the same time another Welshman, Griffith, who had been captured by the Shawnee in 1764, claimed to have met in his wanderings a tribe of Indians speaking his own language; and in 1774 David Jones, in his Journal, attempted to give examples of Welsh identities for the languages of the Ohio valley. Others have attempted to identify this mythic tribe with the Nottoway, Croatan, Modoc, Moki (Hopi), Padouca (Comanche), Pawnee, Kansa, Oto, and, most of all, with the Mandan, the noted traveler Catlin having devoted a whole chapter to the latter hypothesis, but with as little success as all the others. Some theorists have had the mythic tribes speak "Keltic," and some, notably Custer, have made it Gaelic. It seems hardly necessary to state that there is not a provable trace of Welsh, Gaelic, or any other European language in any native American language, excepting for a few words of recent introduction which have had no effect whatever on the general structure or vocabulary.

Consult Catlin, N. Am. Inds., for Mandan theory; Bowen, Am. Discovered by the Welsh, 1876; Burder, Welsh Inds., 1797; Durrett in Filson Club Pub., no. 23, 1908; Lewis in Trans. Oneida Hist. Soc., 1894; Mooney, Growth of a Myth, in Am. Anthr., Oct. 1891, and numerous authorities noted in Winsor, Narr. Crit. Hist. Am., I, notes 109-111, 1889.

The early stories of a tribe of "White Indians" (q. v.), or "White, Bearded Indians," somewhere in the unknown interior, refer sometimes to this mythic Welsh tribe, but more often appear to arise from misinterpreted Indian accounts of other distant European colonies or visitations, or of some tribe of complexion lighter than usual. Wenatchi (Yakima: winātshi, 'river issuing from a canyon,' referring to Wenatchee r.). A Salish division, probably a band of the Pisuows, formerly on Wenatchee r., a tributary of the Columbia in Washington. In 1850 there were said to have been 50 on Yakima res., but 66 were enumerated in the Report on Indian Affairs for 1910 as under the Colville agency. It is uncertain whether these bodies belonged to one original band.

Wendjimadub ('whence he sits'; that is, supposing he was sitting in one spot, he moves from it and sits in another). A Chippewa chief and orator, with a strain of French blood, born at La Pointe, Wis., about 1838. He married a Mississippi Chippewa, and since 1868 has lived at White Earth, where he is at the head of a band of about 40. Wendjimadub is noted for his independence. When, about 1878, a half-breed trader induced all the other chiefs to join him in opposing a worthy Indian agent, Lewis Stowe, in order that an agent might be appointed who would further his schemes, Wendjimadub was the only one who had the courage to stand up openly in the council before prominent Americans, and take the agent's part, declaring his innocence and showing why the warfare was waged against him. Although uneducated, Wendjimadub is by far the best speaker among the Chippewa. He served in a Minnesota regiment throughout the Civil War. He farms to some extent, but is in sufficiently affluent circumstances to live without working. He has been converted to Christianity. (J. A. G.)

Wenona. A small snake (Charina botta) found in California and Mexico. From winona (q. v.) in the Santee Sioux language, signifying 'first-born child' [if a daughter]. The word is also a place name. (A. F. C.)

Wenrohronon (Auēñro'roñ'non', probably from a combination of the noun auēñ'rā', the Huron form of the common Iroquoian vocable denoting 'scum,' 'moss,' 'lather,' with the verb stem -o', 'to float,' 'to be immersed or contained in liquid or in the earth,' 'to be in solution,' 'to be contained in,' with the tribal appellative suffix -roñ'no'. Auēñ'ro' (ouenro in the Jesuit Relations), the base of the term, signifies, as a geographic name, 'where scum floats on the water'; hence Awenrohronon means 'the people or tribe of the place of floating scum.' The suggested meaning of the name would seem to indicate that the Wenrohronon may have lived in the vicinity of the famous oil spring of the town of Cuba, Allegany co., N. Y., described as a filthy, stagnant pool, about 20 ft in diameter, without an outlet. A yellowish-brown oil collects on its surface, and this was the source of the famous "Seneca oil," formerly a popular local remedy for various ailments. The spring was so highly regarded by the Seneca that they always reserved it in their land-sale treaties). One of the tribes which, according to the Jesuit Relation for 1639, had been associated with the Neutral Nation and which had lived on the eastern borders of the Neutral Nation toward the Iroquois, the common enemy of all these tribes. As the territory of the Neutral Nation on the E. side of Niagara r. extended at this date southward to the "end" of L. Erie and eastward to the watershed of Genesee r., at least, the former habitat of the Wenrohronon must have been S. of this territory. So long as the Wenrohronon kept on good terms with the Neutral Nation they were able to withstand their enemies and to maintain themselves against the latter's raids and incursions. But owing to some dissatisfaction, possibly fear of Iroquois displeasure, the Neutral Nation severed its relations with the devoted Wenrohronon, who were thus left a prey to their enemies. Deciding therefore to seek asylum and protection from some other tribe, they sent an embassy to the Hurons, who received them kindly and accepted their proposal, offering to assist them and to escort them with warriors in their migration. Nevertheless, the fatigue and hardships of the long retreat of more than 80 leagues by a body exceeding 600 persons, largely women and children, caused many to die on the way, and nearly all the remainder arrived at Ossossané and other Huron towns ill from the epidemic which was primarily the occasion of their flight. The Jesuit Relation cited says: "Wherever they were received, the best places in the cabins were assigned them, the granaries or caches of corn were opened, and they were given liberty to make such use of it as their needs required."

It is stated (Jes. Rel. 1647-48, xxxiii, 63, 1898) that the southern shores of L. Erie were formerly inhabited "by certain tribes whom we call the Nation of the Cat (or Panther); they have been compelled to retire far inland to escape their enemies, who are farther to the west," and that this Nation of the Panther has a number of fixed towns, as it cultivates the soil. This shows that the appellation "Nation du Chat" was a generic name for "certain tribes" dwelling S. and S. E. of L. Erie, whose enemies farther westward had forced at least some of them to migrate eastward. From the list of names of tribes cited by Brebeuf in the Jesuit Relation for 1635 (33, 1858) the names of four tribes of the Iroquois tongue dwelling S. of L. Erie and of the domain of the Five Iroquois tribes occur in the order: Andastoerrhonons (Conestoga), Scahentoarrhonons (People of Wyoming valley), Rhierrhonons (the Erie), and the Ahouenroch-rhonons (Wenrohronon). But this last name is omitted from the list of tribal names cited from Father Ragueneau's "Carte Huronne," recorded by Father

LeJeune in his Relation for 1640 (35, 1858), because this tribe, in 1639, becoming too weak to resist the Iroquois, having lost the support of an alliance with the Neutral Nation, and being afflicted with an epidemic, probably smallpox, had taken flight, part seeking refuge among the Hurons and part among the Neutral Nation, with which peoples they became incorporated. The Jesuit Relation for 1641 (80, 1858) says that in the town of Khioetoea, surnamed St Michel, of the Neutral Nation, a certain foreign nation, named A8enrehronon, which formerly dwelt beyond "the Erie or the Nation du Chat (or the Panther Nation)," had for some years past taken refuge. Father Jean de Brebeuf and Father Joseph Marie Chaumonot started from Ste Marie of the Hurons on Nov. 2, 1640, on a mission to the Neutral Nation; but owing to several causes, chiefly false reports spread among them by Huron spies concerning the nature of this mission, they were coldly received by the Neutrals as a whole, and were subjected to much abuse and contumely. But the Wenrohronon dwelling at Khioetoea lent willing ears to the gospel, and an old woman who had lost her hearing was the first adult person among them to be baptized. Bressani's Relation for 1653 (Thwaites ed., xxxix, 141, 1899), however, says that among the Hurons the Oenronronons, whether by true or false report, added weight to the charges against the Jesuits of being the cause of the epidemic and other misfortunes of the people. The foregoing quotation definitely declares that this tribe of the Wenrohronon dwelt before their migration "beyond the Erie" or the Panther Nation. It is therefore probable that this tribe lived on the upper waters of the Allegheny, possibly on the W. branch of the Susquehanna, and that it was one of the tribes generically called the Black Minquaas. Writing to his brother on Apr. 27, 1639, Father DuPeron (Jes. Rel. 1639, xv, 159, 1898), in reference to the Wenrohronon, says: "We have a foreign nation which has taken refuge here, both on account of the Iroquois, their enemies, and on account of the epidemic, which is still causing them to die here in large numbers; they are nearly all baptized before death." Of the Wenrohronon, Father Bressani, writing in 1653 (ibid., xxxix, 141, 1899), says that they had then only recently come into the Huron country, and that they "had formerly traded with the English, Dutch, and other heretical Europeans." Nothing is known of the numbers of the refugee Wenrohronon who fled to the Neutral Nation, but these were in addition to the "more than 600" who arrived in the Huron country in 1639. From Herrman's map of Virginia and Maryland in 1670 (published in 1673) much information is derived in regard to the valley of the Juniata r., the w. branch of the Susquehanna, and the Wyoming or Scahentowanen valley. As the Wenrohronon were on hostile terms with the Iroquois tribes, and as they were known to have traded with the English, the Dutch, and other Europeans, it would appear that they must have followed the routes to the trading places on the Delaware and the lower Hudson customarily followed by the Black Minquaas, with whom they seem to have been allied. From Herrman's map it is learned also that the Black Minquaas lived w. of the Alleghany mts., on the Ohio or Black Minquaas r., and that these Indians reached Delaware r. by means of the Conemaugh, a branch of the Ohio or Black Minquaas r., and the Juniata, a branch of the Susquehanna, and that prior to 1670 the Black Minquaas came over the Alleghany mts. along these branches as far as the Delaware to trade. These Wenrohronon were probably closely allied in interests with the Black Minquaas, and so came along the same route to trade on the Delaware. Diverging eastward from the Wyoming valley were three trails—one through Wind gap to Easton, Pa., the second by way of the Lackawanna at Capouse meadows through Cobb's gap and the Lackawaxen to the Delaware and Hudson, and the third, sometimes called the "Warrior's path," by way of Ft Allen and along the Lehigh to the Delaware Water-gap at Easton. From the journal of Rev. Wm. Rogers with Sullivan's expedition against the Iroquois in 1779, it is learned that in the Great Swamp is Locust Hill, where evident marks of a destroyed Indian village were discovered; that the Tobyhanna and Middle crs. flow into Tunkhannock, which flows into the head branch of the Lehigh, which in turn joins the Delaware at Easton; that Moosick mtn., through a gap of which Sullivan passed into the Great Swamp, is on the dividing line or ridge between the Delaware and the Susquehanna. This indicates the routes by which the Wenrohronon could readily have reached the Delaware r. for trading purposes at a very early date.

LeJeune (Jes. Rel. 1639, xvii, 213, 1898) states that the Wenrohronon, "those strangers who recently arrived in this country," excel in drawing out an arrow from the body and in curing the wound, but that the efficacy of the prescription avails only in the presence of a pregnant woman. In the same Relation (p. 37) he says that "the number of the faithful who make profession of Christianity in this village amounts to nearly 60, of whom many are Wenrohronons from among those poor strangers taking refuge in this country." According to the Jesuit Relation for 1672-73 (Lvii, 197, 1899) there were Wenrohronon captives among the Seneca, along with others from the Neutral Nation, the Onnontioga, and the Hurons; the three nations or tribes last-named, according to Father Frémin (1669-70), composed the Seneca town of Kanagaro, the Neutrals and the Onnontioga being described as having seen scarcely any Europeans or having heard of the true God.

The historical references above given indicate that the Wenrohronon, before their wars with the Iroquois and before they were stricken with smallpox, must have been a tribe of considerable importance, numbering at least 1,200 or 1,500, and possibly 2,000 persons. (J. N. B. H.)

Werawahon. A village of the Powhatan confederacy, situated in 1608 on the N. bank of Chickahominy r., in New Kent co., Va.—Smith (1629), Va., I, map, repr. 1819.

Werowacomoco ('chief's town'). A town of the Powhatan confederacy, situated in 1608 on the N. bank of York r., in Gloucester co., Va., about opposite the mouth of Queen cr. Although it was the favorite residence of Powhatan, the population did not exceed 200 persons. On account of the encroachments of the whites he subsequently withdrew to Orapaks.

Werowocomoco.—Simons in Smith (1629), Va., I, 162, repr. 1819 (misprint). Werawocomoco.—Smith (1629), ibid., 117. Werowoomoco.—Ibid., 142. Werowocomicos.—Jefferson, Notes, 138, table, 1801. Werowocomoco.—Smith (1629), op. cit., 74.

Werowance. A chief, or head-man, among the former Indians of Maryland and Virginia. Gerard (Am. Anthr., IX, 112, 1907) derives the word from Renape wirowánlësu, 'he is rich,' or 'he exists in affluence,' the chief radical being wiro, 'to be rich.' Other forms of the word are weroance, wirowance, wiroans, wyroans, wyoraunce, etc.

Wesaenikashika ('snake people'). A Quapaw gens.

West Abeika (Aiabeka, 'unhealthy place'). A former Choctaw village located by Romans at the head of Chickasawhay r., Miss., probably in the present Neshoba co. It was called West Abeika to distinguish it from another town (see East Abeika) of the name at the junction of Sukenatcha and Straight crs.—Halbert in Pub. Miss. Hist. Soc., VI, 425, 427, 1902. See Abihka.

Abeka.—Romans, Florida, 323, 1775. West Abeika.—West Florida map, ca. 1775.

West Congeta.—Romans, Fla., 315, 1775. West Congeto.—West Fla. map, ca. 1775.

Westenhuck (corruption of Hous'atenuc, Eng. Housatonic, 'at the other side of the mountain.'—Trumbull). A former Mahican village near Great Barrington, Berkshire co., Mass. It was the capital of the Mahican confederacy after the removal of the council fire from Schodac. The inhabitants removed to Stockbridge in 1736, soon after the establishment of the mission at that place. A few removed to Pennsylvania, where they joined the Delawares and kindred tribes. Most of the Stockbridges came originally from Westenhuck. (J. M.)

Wahktoohook.—Hoyt, Antiq. Res., 209, 1824. Wahktoohook.—Ibid., 225. Westenhook.—Deed of 1679 in N. Y. Doc. Col. Hist., XIII, 545, 1881. Westenhuck.—Ruttenber, Tribes Hudson R., 62, 1872 (name used by Moravian missionaries). W-nahk-ta-kook.—Ibid. (name used by English missionaries). Wnahktukeek.—Barber, Hist. West Greenlanders. A geographic group of Eskimo without recognized subdivisions. They have long been Christianized by German Moravian and Danish missionaries, and live principally about the mission stations. A considerable admixture of white blood is found among them. They are expert in hunting the seal with the large harpoon and bladder, and manage their kaiaks with marvelous skill. They numbered 9,752 in 1880. Their villages, including the Danish trading posts and the mission stations, are as follows: Adjuitsuppa, Agdluitsok, Aglutok, Amerdlok, Angpalartok, Arpik, Arsuk, Atanekerdruk, Blaesedael, Christianshaab, Claushaven, Drynaeskirk, Egedesminde, Episok, Fiskernaes, Frederiksdal, Frederikshaab, Godthaab, Holstenborg, Igdlorpait, Inigsuarsak, Ipik, Itivliarsuk, Ivigtut, Ivikat, Jacobshavn, Julianehaab, Kaersok, Kagsersuak, Kanajormiut, Kangek, Kangiartsoak, Kapisilik, Kariak, Karsok, Karusuk, Kasigianguit, Kekerarsuarak, Kinalik, Kingiktok, Kornok, Lichtenfels, Maklykaut, Merkitsok, Nanortalik, Narsak, Narsarsuk, Nugsoak, Numarsuak, Nunatarsuak, Ny Herrnhut, Okossisak, Pamiadluk, Proven, Ritenbenk, Sagdlet, Saitok, Sardlok, Sarkak, Sermilik, Sukkertoppen, Svartehuk, Tornait, Tuapait, Tunuliarbik, Umanak, Upervivik, Utlaksuk, Uvingasok, Yotlik, Zukkertop.

Westo. A name applied by the coast Indians of southern South Carolina to a tribe dwelling along Savannah r. in the latter part of the 17th century. They were dreaded enemies of the coast people, who declared that they were man-eaters. In 1674 Henry Woodward visited their town, or a town of theirs, situated on a point on the w. bank of Savannah r., two-thirds surrounded by the river and protected by palisades. Their predatory habits made them particularly troublesome in 1669-71, and in 1674 it was necessary to send against them a company of volunteer troops. In 1681 part of the Shawnee drove them from the region about Augusta, Ga., and little is heard of them afterward. It appears, however, that some of the Westo, at least, retired among the Lower Creeks, first to Okmulgee r. and thence to Chattahoochee r., from which circumstance and other evidence it is almost certain that they were identical with the well-known Yuchi (q. v.). This tribe is the "Oustack" of Lederer (1672), and perhaps the Yustaga (q. v.) of the Florida explorers in the 16th century. (J. R. S.)

Oustaca.—De Bry map (1591) in Le Moyne, Narr., Appleton trans., 1875. Oustack.—Lederer, Discov., 17, 1672. Oustacs.—Gatschet, Creek Migr. Leg., I, 48, 1884. Westoes.—Archdale (1707) in Ramsay, Hist. So. Car., I, 34, 1809.

Wetamoo. A female chieftain of a part of the Wampanoag, in the latter part of the 17th century, generally known during Philip's war as the Squaw Sachem of Pocasset. She was the wife of Alexander (Wamsutta), Philip's elder brother, and sister of Wootonekauske, Philip's wife, and until Alexander's death (1662) went under the name of Namumpam. She survived her husband, and after his death was called Wetamoo (Weetamoe, Weetamoo, Wetamoe, Wetamore). She espoused Philip's cause in his war with the English, and aided him with warriors and provisions. After the death of her first husband she married Quinnapin (known also as Petananuet and Peter Nunuit), a son of Ninigret, chief of the Niantic tribe. While fleeing from the English she was drowned, Aug. 6, 1676, in attempting to cross Tehticut r. Her head was cut off and set upon a pole in sight of Indian prisoners who were her adherents. According to Mrs. Rowlandson (Narr., 73, 1828), who was a prisoner of Quinnapin, Wetamoo spent much time in her personal adornment. At a dance "she had a kersey coat covered with girdles of wampum from the loins upward. Her arms from her elbows to her hands were covered with bracelets. There were handfuls of necklaces about her neck, and several sorts of jewels in her ears. She had fine, red, stockings, and white shoes, her hair powdered, and her face painted red." (A. F. C. C. T.)

Wetchon ('panther'). A Yuchi clan. Weto^{an}.—Speck, Yuchi Inds., 71, 1909 (tc=ch). Wetoh^{6a} tahá.—Gatschet, Uchee MS., B. A. E., 1885 (= 'panther gens').

Wetsiaus. A Siuslaw village on Siuslaw r., Oreg.

We'-tai-aus'.—Dorsey in Jour. Am. Folk-lore, III, 230, 1890.

Wetsitsiko. The Yurok name of a Karok village on Klamath r., N. W. Cal., between the mouth of Salmon r. and Orleans Bar.

Wetumpka (Creek: u'-i, or u-i'wa, 'water'; túmki, 'it is rumbling'). Two former Upper Creek towns, 4 m. apart, on the E. bank of Coosa r., Elmore co., Ala., the falls of the river lying between them. Swan in 1791 called them Big and Little Wetumpkee. The modern town Wetumpka stands on the site of Big Wetumpka, about $\frac{1}{2}$ m. below the falls; and another town, West Wetumpka, has sprung up on the w. side of the river, which flows through a deep canyon at that place. The "Stincard" language spoken by these two towns, which are generally referred to as one settlement, was the Alibamu dialect. (A. S. G.)

Oweatumka.—Woodward, Reminisc., 48, 1859. Wee-tam-ka.—Adair, Am. Wewanitowuk. A band of Cree.—Hutchins (1770) quoted by Richardson, Arct. Exped., II, 37, 1851.

Wewasee (We-wi'-see, 'buzzard'). A gens of the Shawnee.—Morgan, Anc. Soc., 168, 1877.

Wewenoc. A tribe of the Abnaki confederacy that lived on the coast of Maine about the mouth of the Kennebec r., in Lincoln and Sagadahoc cos. They were closely related to the Arosaguntacook, with whom they combined at an early period when displaced by the English. They figured in the Falmouth treaty of 1749 and other treaties of that period. Before 1727 most of them had removed to St Francis and Bécancour, Quebec, and in 1747 only a few families remained in Maine, who soon afterward removed also to Canada, where a remnant still exists.

Whaleback Shellheap. The extensive oyster-shell heaps of Damariscotta r., Me., lie within the towns of Newcastle and Damariscotta. Besides many small mounds and layers of shell, there are five heaps of large size. Two of these are on the w. shore, the more northerly of which, known as the Peninsular mound, being about 400 ft long. The greatest depth of shells is about 22 ft. A hundred yards downstream is another heap of irregular form, extending along the shore for several hundred feet. On the opposite shore are three principal deposits. The greater part of the largest of these, the Whaleback mound, was removed in 1886, and the shells were ground for commercial purposes. The Peabody Museum of Harvard University purchased the right to all artifacts found. This heap was approximately 300 ft long and 125 ft wide; its greatest depth was 16½ ft. There seem to have been two or three periods of deposition of shells forming the mound, separated by intervals during which thin layers of mold had accumulated.

The mound was composed almost wholly of oyster shells, a few of the larger valves being 11 and 12 in. in length. Occasionally shells of other species of mollusks were found; five or six Indian skeletons were unearthed, and fireplace hearths, ashes, charcoal, and bones of various animals occurred frequently, but artifacts of stone, bone, and antler were extremely rare. A small number of stone adze blades of the nearly straight-edged type were obtained, also a very few rude pestles, hammer-stones, and other common forms. Fragments of a considerable number of earthenware pots were recovered at various depths. The sherds from 10, 12, and 14 ft below the surface have the same characteristics as those from the upper layers, all of them being of the well-known New England Algonquian types. The "roulette" and indented methods of decoration prevailed throughout. The potter's art in this region made little if any advance during the long period necessary for the accumulation of 12 or 14 ft of shells.

Whiggiggin. A written permit to hunt, from local officials or from Indian chiefs. According to Schele de Vere (Americanisms, 21, 1872) this word is in common use in Maine and adjoining parts of Canada: from awikhigan in the Abnaki dialect of Algonquian, signifying '(what is) carved (scratched, or engraved)', hence anything written, as a letter, a bill, or a book. (A. F. C.)

Whilkut. The Hupa name of a small Athapascan division occupying the upper portion of the valley of Redwood cr., N. Cal. Their language differs slightly from that of the Hupa, from whom they were separated by a mountain ridge, and they might be considered a part of that tribe except that they seem to have had no political connection with them and differed in religious practices. The routes of the pack-trains lay through their territory, and the conflicts between the whites and Whilkut were frequent and bloody. The survivors were taken to the reservation at Hupa soon after its establishment, but after 1870 they drifted back to their old homes, where 10 or 12 families are still living. Below them on Redwood cr. are the Chilula. (P. E. G.)

White Dog Sacrifice. The annual immolation of the white dog (or dogs) at the New Year ceremony by the Iroquois is the satisfaction or the fulfilment of a dream of Teharonhiawagon (q. v.), one of their chief gods, who, in the Iroquoian cosmic philosophy, is the impersonation or the embodiment of all faunal and floral life on earth. He is therefore called the Master of Life, or the Life God. As prescribed by the ritual employed, the date for beginning the ceremony, or more properly series of rites, is on the 5th day of the new moon, called Disgō'nā' ('long moon'), which is the second coming after the winter solstice, or about the end of January or the early part of February. These New Year rites deal symbolically with very striking phenomena in nature, namely, the weakening or the depression of the power of the Life God by the Monster Forces of the Winter God, exhibited in the seeming demise of nearly all fauna and flora following the departure southward of the Sun, and the dispersion of the Winter God's forces and the renewal of life in all things on earth by his return northward. In the native mind these changes are due largely to enchantments produced by powerful orendas (q. v.), or magic powers, struggling for supremacy. So the rites and ceremonies believed to be efficacious in the restoration of health among men are believed to be likewise effective among the gods. Dreams being the recognized means through which tutelaries may reveal the objects or agencies to be employed for the recovery of health when ruined by sorcery, it was assumed that Teharonhiawagon, in view of his weakened power, must have dreamed what would restore his life, the life in nature, to its normal condition; and the tutelaries of man, his father's clansmen, have revealed, it is thought, the fact that he has dreamed that a sacrificial victim and an offering of tobacco are required to disenchant the life forces in nature and in man. The motive of these New Year rites is therefore (1) to resuscitate all life on earth by supplying to the Master of Life what he has dreamed is imperatively necessary to secure the well-being of his specific incarnations—the normal bodies and beings in nature, and (2) to renew through rite and ceremony all the agencies and means, largely mythic or figmental in character, which are believed to secure and promote man's welfare. Should the blight cast upon the face of nature by the demons of the Winter God, should the migration of birds and fishes, and the hibernation of game and other animals become permanent facts, unchangeable phenomena of the known world, the wise men of the Iroquois taught that all normal life on earth—birds, animals, and men—would perish from the land, and that corn, beans, squashes, and sunflowers, and the precious tobacco, could no longer be planted to sprout and grow to maturity, so that the demon Famine would devour the people. It is this gloomy prospect that impels the tutelary of Teharonhiawagon, the Master of Life, to reveal to his soul, through a dream, what is needed, in the form of an offering by mankind, to thwart the malign purpose of the demons of the Winter God, Tawiskaron (q. v.). He who seeks the fulfilment of his dream must chant his death song, the challenge song of his tutelary, and for this reason Teharonhiawagon, too, sings his death chant in midwinter, for if his dream be disregarded and remain unsatisfied, the complete destruction of all life on earth would take place. The Caucasian custom of drinking the health of a person is a vestigial reflex of a similar concept.

In considering the status, the character, and the dependence on man of Teharonhiawagon as a chief god among others, an important caution is to be kept in mind, namely, that while he is regarded as the Master of Life, it must not be inferred that he is also the god or ruler of all other things; and it must not be overlooked that all gods as such were themselves subject to the inexorable decrees of Fate, of Destiny. In primitive thought the concept or idea of Fate or Destiny is clearly developed out of the countless failures of the gods to bring about results contrary to the established course of nature; every failure of a god to accomplish a certain expected result was at once attributed to one of two things: either to the conjectured inability of the god to change the decree of Fate, i. e. the established order of things, or to an abortive attempt of the people to perform a rite or ceremony in accordance with a prescribed ritual. These considerations exempted Teharonhiawagon and other gods from censure for the nonperformance of the impossible, and they also show that sometimes the gods stood in need of human aid, either directly or ceremonially.

The New Year ceremony is commonly performed in every so-called long-house or assembly-hall in the tribe, for there are sometimes several such structures within the tribal limits, one in each village or small town, although two or more contiguous small villages may unite in holding a joint session. However, the village which is the first to celebrate the festival must begin it on the day prescribed by the ritual, and the other villages consecutively; or the several villages and towns may perform the ceremony simultaneously.

The name given by all the Iroquoian peoples, with perhaps the tentative exception of the Cherokee, to this ceremony is some variant, dialectic or other, of Ononhouarori (Lafitau). In the Jesuit Relations and in other early writings the following forms occur: Ononhouaroia, Honnonouaroria, Honnaouaroria, Hononouaroria, Hagnonharioraha, Ononhwaroia, Ononhara, Annonh8aroria (Huron), Gan-onh8arori (Mohawk, Bruyas). In the present Onondaga it appears as Ganon-hwai'wł', a form cognate with iakonon-hwaiiđ'hđ', signifying 'it drives, urges, or distracts one's brain,' having reference to the supposed promptings of the soul, inspired by the tutelary to seek to acquire something designed to promote and secure the welfare of the body. Hence the song or chant commonly expressed such a desire. In describing such parts of this ceremony as were observed by them, the early Jesuit missionaries among the Hurons and the Iroquois, and the early French writers of Canada, employed expressions like la folie, ou le renversement de tête ou du cerveau, i. e. "the madness, or the dizziness or swimming in the head or brain," and avoir la tête en écharpe, i. e. "to have the head in a sling," and, taking a part for the whole, "the festival of dreams, or of desires," and confusing the rite of purification by fire with the rite of kindling the new fire, "the fire festivals." Father De Carheil, writing of the Cayuga in 1670, says that they do not worship the dream, as such, as the Master of Life, but a certain akatkonsoria ('false-face'), identifying it with Teharonhiawagon. It is only through these expressions that the ceremony may be recognized in these early writings. Among very early writers among the Mohawk, parts of the ceremony have been recorded by Van Curler (1634), and among the Hurons by Sagard (1626) who gave a very incisive account, from which it appears that the participants in some of the rites were more obsessed and maniacal than are those of the present-day Iroquois. Wholly misapprehending the motives underlying the several rites of the ceremony, Brebeuf (1636), like his contemporaries, says that the Ononhara, "a certain kind of madness," is for fools (or madcaps).

In early times the number of dogs to be sacrificed was apparently not ritually limited; for in a ceremony held by the Hurons, Feb. 24, 1656, in fulfilment of an order purporting to have been issued by an apparition of Teharonhiawagon himself, 10 dogs, 10 wampum beads from every cabin, a wampum belt 10 strands in breadth, 4 measures of sunflower seed, and as many beans, were sacrificed, for the entire destruction of the country had been threatened in case of a failure to provide the required gifts and offerings. At another, held in 1639, likewise in answer to a direct order of an apparition, 22 presents were asked, among the items of which were 6 dogs of a certain form and color, 50 pieces of tobacco, a large canoe, etc. It is not until late modern times that the dog (or dogs) was not partly eaten after having been partially burned in the sacrificial fire; for as early as 1642 the Jesuit Relations say that the dogs are eaten as "they usually eat their captives." The missionary Kirkland witnessed among the Seneca a ceremony lasting 7 days, in which two white dogs were strangled, painted, decorated, and hung up in the center of the village on the evening preceding the beginning of the rites; and after the performances had lasted several days, the dogs were taken down and placed on a pyre, and when nearly consumed one was removed and placed in a kettle with vegetables and eaten. This shows that as late as 1760 the flesh of the victim was ceremonially eaten among the Iroquois.

According to the ritual, in the performance of this and of all other tribal ceremonies each of the two phratries of clans (see Tribe) has essential parts in every act to execute, which the other may not, without at once destroying the assumed mystic effect of the ceremony on the welfare of the people and of the Master of Life.

In the preparations preliminary to the sacrifice of the victim two fire rites are performed, which consume three days; one is for the purpose of rekindling the fires after removing the old from all the cabins of the community. The Directors of the Four Ceremonies appoint two persons, one from each phratry, to do this. Among the Onondaga these two persons are chosen from the Deer and the Wolf clans, respectively, these two being the heads of the phratries to which they belong. In the performance of their sacred duties these two persons, who must have the rank of federal chiefs, must wear the native costume—a feather head-dress made of the webs stripped from the shafts, and a blue sash when available—must be painted with a spot of vermilion on each cheek, and must carry each a wooden paddle, about 4 or 5 ft in length, on which must be delineated the clan tutelary of the bearer. The duty of the Deer herald in every lodge is, while rekindling the fire, to deliver a thanksgiving address with the announcement of the beginning of the Ganon'hurai'wi', or New Year ceremony, and to urge the inmates to abandon their labors and amusements in order to attend in person at the long-house or tribal assembly-hall; the duty of the Wolf herald is continuously to chant on the way and in the lodges the Ganon'hurai'wi', or the Death chant of Teharonhiawagon. The rites at the assembly-hall do not begin until these two persons return there and make their report.

In making his report of the performance of the sacred commission entrusted to them, the spokesman in behalf of himself and his cousin of the Wolf phratry says, among many other things, that they then place the entire matter on the floor of the assembly-hall and that thereafter the whole responsibility for carrying on the ceremony devolve on the Two Cousins (i. e. the two clan phratries of the tribe) occupying respectively the two sides of the phratral fires; that they two have chanted the Death chant in behalf of Teharonhiawagon; that they have rekindled the fires in his behalf with the paddles; that the session of the Ganon'hurai'wi', or New Year ceremony, is now open for all the people, even to the least of the children; and that in the ensuing fire rite they two will pass through the fires in behalf of Teharonhiawagon. Then a speaker chosen from the Deer phratry receives in the name of the people the report with suitable commendations of the two officials, and then in behalf of the assembled people directs his words in a long address to extolling the handiwork of Teharonhiawagon as exhibited in nature. Vividly he addresses the bodies and beings and elements in nature as anthropic persons. Beginning with the lowest in position, he gives thanks to "Our Mother, the Earth," for her blessings; and then in like manner he addresses the Grasses, the Plants, the Shrubs, and the Trees, severally, feelingly declaring that all these things were made "curative medicine" by Teharonhiawagon to promote the welfare of man; then the Rivers, the Lakes, the Springs, and All Moving Waters, and so too "Our Mothers the Corn, the Beans, and the Squash" receive a like measure of praise and thanksgiving for the blessings supplied by them; then the Game Animals which run or fly or swim likewise receive praise and thanks for the sustenance which they give to man; then, in order, the Fire is thanked for its many blessings to man; in like manner the Sun, "Our Elder Brother," the Moon, "Our Grandmother," and her Assistants, the Morning Star and the Stars, are all thanked for their care and guidance; then the Four Thunderers and Rainmakers, "Our Grandfathers," receive praise and thanks for the many blessings and comforts which they bestow on man and on all living things on earth in watering the earth and all that grows thereon and in keeping the water in springs, rivers, and lakes fresh; lastly, the Air (or the Wind) is thanked for preserving fresh the air that moves on the earth, even as Teharonhiawagon has willed it. The speaker now addresses the people, strongly reminding them that such and so many are the required words of thanksgiving which must be spoken by man to all the things established by Teharonhiawagon and to all those assistant anthropic beings to whom he has assigned a share in the government of the world by entrusting them severally with various duties for the promotion of human welfare and who will aid in protecting man during the New Year ceremony, then just begun, in which it is the solemn duty of man to execute faithfully the decrees of Teharonhiawagon. Finally, apostrophizing the Master of Life, the speaker summarizes all that he has said in behalf of the people and humbly begs of him health, peace, and contentment for all mankind during the period the ceremony will last. Then he announces the beginning of the second fire rite by announcing to the cousin phratry of the Wolf that his phratry has already appointed the official who will take charge of the paddles, and he earnestly enjoins on all persons, both adults and children, the imperative necessity for every one to perform this rite and solemnly cautions every one not to withdraw his hand when a paddle is offered by the chosen official.

This fire rite, called Aoutaenhrohi ('to asperge with ashes') by the Hurons, has for its motive the disinfection or rather disenchantment of all persons from the contagion of fevers and hot maladies produced by the Fire-god, the "Demon Aoutaenhrohi," by passing through the breath of fire, and the exorcism and expulsion from the village and country of the malign spirits that caused these evils. The Jesuit Relation for 1637 relates that a woman among the Hurons for whom this fire rite was being performed, passed barefoot through 200 or 300 fires maintained expressly for her in the several cabins, and that she was not thereby burned in the least. At the present time this rite is performed symbolically only. The persons performing the rite each receive a wooden paddle and then repair to each of the two phratral fires in the long-house, where they dip up the ashes and let them fall. For this purpose small parties of men, women, and children are formed from either phratry, acting consecutively or sometimes simultaneously. Every party, however, must have a leader, a chanter, and a speaker who makes an address of praise and of thanksgiving to Teharonhiawagon in behalf of those who accompany him to the two fires. When the people have all passed through the fire, the two persons who acted as heralds perform this fire rite in behalf of Teharonhiawagon himself; and then two men and two women from each phratry with the usual complement of a leader, a chanter, and a speaker, accompanied by all the people, bank the phratral fires lighted in behalf of Teharonhiawagon, and thus the rite closes.

In this rite the parties from the Deer phratry bearing paddles leave the room by the eastern doorway, turn to the lefthand, or sinistrally, and go around the building by the northern side and reënter the room by the western doorway; but the parties from the Wolf phratry bearing paddles leave the room by the western doorway, turn to the lefthand, or sinistrally, and go around the building by the south side and reënter the room by the eastern doorway. Thus half of the circuit is made by one phratry, and the other half by the other; and by turning sinistrally the parties do not at any point in their journey turn their backs to the Sun, their "Elder Brother." This distinctly emphasizes the dual or phratral organization of the tribe (q. v.), whose functions symbolize those of the male and the female principles in nature.

With the close of the two fire rites, the Dream festival or ceremony begins; this usually lasts three days. This rite is the cult of the personal tutelary, and consists (1) in the renewal or rejuvenation of the orenda, or magic power, of the personal tutelary of every person who possesses one, by having its distinctive challenge song or chant resung by the clansmen of the father of the owner, this resinging being done according to ritual by one or more persons with a drum or specific rattles; and (2) in "the divining or seeking to guess the dream-word" of those who have dreamed specific dreams, for the purpose of ascertaining thereby the suggested or revealed tutelary of the dreamer, who is commonly a child, and the bestowal of a small symbolic material representation of this tutelary upon him by his father's clansmen. A challenge song or chant accompanies the bestowal of the symbol referred to, and it is this which is renewed in subsequent years at such a ceremony. Every clan of each phratry appoints a man and a woman to hear these specific dreams from children and diffident persons in their clan, and they afterward relate these dreams to the chiefs or priest-chiefs whose duty it is to divine the tutelary for each. The songs which accompany the tutelaries comprise practically all those belonging to the tribe, with the exception of those employed for condolence and sorcery. The rite begins with the renewal of the two challenge songs of Teharonhiawagon himself; these two are the Great Feather Dance and the Drum Dance. Of course, this consists in singing only one of the scores of songs and chants belonging to each of these rites or dances. In many cases these songs constitute integral parts of the ritual of the Four Ceremonies, which are: (1) the Great Feather Dance, with about 150 songs with dance accompaniment; (2) the Drum Dance, with approximately a like number of songs; (3) the Adoñ'wĩ', or Clan Personal Chant, every clan having about 100 of these, and (4) the Great Wager or Bet which is laid between the two phratries. This is the game of the plum-pits.

In addition to these songs and dances, some persons may ask to have performed the rite of aspergation with ashes by the Hoñdu'ĩ' or False-faces, or that of insufflation by them, or that of the Lament of the Women, or that of the Waving of Evergreen Branches, or that of the Adĩ-goñwi'šēn' or Dance of the Corn People, or that of the Chant of Death, or any one of many others. It is sometimes necessary that persons from both phratries assist in the performance. There are, too, certain tutelaries whose nature is supposed to be such that their challenge songs need not be renewed at the New Year ceremony, but they may be rejuvenated at any other time at a public or private festival held in their honor. These independent tutelaries are the Sun, whose challenge song is the Skin-drum Dance (One'hō'wĩ'); the Moon, whose challenge songs are three in number, namely, the Ā'goñwi'šēn' or Dance of the Corn Mother, the Owäsgä'nie' or Shuffle Dance, the Four Nights Dance; the Thunderers, whose challenge song is the Wä'sa'sä or War Dance; and, lastly, those whose challenge songs belong to the Gä'hi'dō'hu'i' or Dance of the Sorcerers. This Dream Rite is closed with the visit of the Hoñdu'i', or False-face Society, whose reception requires that the dream-word of the eldest of these be divined and the presents required for its satisfaction be provided; thereafter this society disenchanters or disinfects the assembly-hall and the village by aspergation with ashes and coals of fire. This rite is the last one preliminary to the sacrifice of the White Dog, which must ritually take place at sunrise of the morning following.

The victim must be of the native variety, white in color, and must be killed by strangulation in order not to break any of its bones. According to the ritual the body must be dressed and adorned, with the face painted in such manner as to represent Teharonhiawagon—the highest type of man; it is profusely marked with red spots about an inch in diameter; white, blue, red, and green ribbons are secured around the neck, body, tail, and legs; the feet are fastened with ribbons to the hips and the neck in such manner that the legs remain at right angles to the body, thus simulating the standing position of the animal; a long loop of ribbon is fastened to the feet for the purpose of carrying it; to the head is attached a small head-dress or crown of feathers, and around the neck is placed a small string of wampum as a credential of the authenticity of its mission; it is borne with the head directed forward, and it is placed on the song-bench in the assembly-hall with its head toward the west. On the bench are placed in order, first a bow and arrows; second, the victim; and, lastly, a parcel of native tobacco: these are the offerings to be made to the representative of Teharonhiawagon. Upon their entering the assembly-hall the priest-chiefs appointed by both phratries must offer these things to the Teharonhiawagon: those of the Wolf, the bow and arrows (which are refused), and the victim; while the Deer priests offer the tobacco. The last two are accepted. Then the Teharonhiawagon leaves the room, followed by the bearers of the offerings and by the people, and repairs to the pyre, which is kindled at a suitable distance to the southeast of the building. The victim and the tobacco are placed on a platform prepared for them on the southwest side of the fire; the sacrificing priest takes his position on the west side of the fire, and, having the victim on his right, faces the east; the chiefs and ceremonial officers gather on the north, west, and south sides of the fire, and back of these the people assemble, and all those who have brought their tutelaries then place them around the sacrificial fire. Thus the sacrificing priest is brought to face the impersonator of Teharonhiawagon, who stands southeastward from the fire. Then thrice in a loud voice the sacrificial chief exclaims "Ku'/'" meaning "Here, do thou receive it!" The first two paragraphs and the one in which the sacrifice is made are as follows:

"Now, thou hearest the people who dwell on the earth calling (on thee). Thou dost too plainly see that there where the ceremonial officers have kindled a fire for thee, mankind stand in a body, in a regulated assembly. Moreover, they who stand there are those persons whose lives are still spared on earth and who are indeed thy father's clansmen. Now, moreover, do thou listen, thence, to them when they shall speak. Thou didst ordain it, willing that it should be thus on earth a matter of the greatest moment which should take place in midwinter; that is to say, on the 5th day of the moon Disgō'nä', the matter which thou didst call by the name of the 'Great Sacred Ceremony of the Gano'hwai'wī'.' Thou didst resolve, too, that thou wouldst continue to honor this ceremony, in which mankind should perform the rites of it for thee, and in which they should chant their dream songs, and through which their words should go to thee when giving thee thanksgivings. This is what took place in thy mind, thou who dwellest in the sky.

"Thou didst will, too, that all persons should be equally obligated to perform this ceremony—the roia'ner chiefs, the officers, both men and women, of the Four Ceremonies, the public and the children too. Thou didst will, too, that all these persons should pass through the fires kindled for thee by the officers of the Four Ceremonies. Thus did it come to pass in thy mind. And, moreover, nothing obstructs thee, so that thou hast plainly seen that all those whose lives are still spared have now performed this duty: all have fulfilled what thou hast ordained, thou who dwellest in the sky."

Then coming to the paragraph of sacrifice, he continues: "So, then, do thou now know, too, that with due formality mankind make use of what thou didst ordain for us to employ, when thou didst will that this shall be the principal thing, that that shall be their word—this pinioned object [the victim]. Thus it took place in thy mind, thou who dwellest in the sky. So, now, here lies that which shall authenticate the words of man, when thou wilt hear the whole earth speak. Now, moreover, do thou know that that by which thy father's clansmen, mankind, dwelling on the earth, make answer to thy dream-word, goes hence to thee [casts victim on the pyre]. Thou dost plainly see the number of persons who are assembled at the place where those who attend to thy affairs kindled a fire for thee."

The entire invocation would require about 7,400 English words to translate it. At the end of every subsequent paragraph the priest throws a portion of the sacrificial tobacco into the fire, until all is offered. This ends the sacrifice. On the four or five days following, the Rites of the Four Ceremonies are performed in their entirety. These are the rites distinctive of the New Year or Midwinter Ceremony of the Iroquois. (J. N. B. H.)

White Eagle Band. A former Sioux band, named from its chief.—H. R. Ex. Doc. 96, 42d Cong., 3d sess., 15, 1873.

White Earth. One of the Natchez villages of early writers. It was either on the site of the subsequent concession of White Earth on St Catherines cr., Miss., or else was identical with White Apple.

Terre Blanche.—Dumont in French, Hist. Coll. La., v, 70, 1853 (in a footnote given as the same as the Great White Apple village). Washt Kahápa.—Gatshet, MS., B. A. E. ('town white': Natchez name). White Clay.—Gayarre, La., I, 156, 1851.

White-eyes (Koquethagechton). A former chief of the Delawares in Ohio. He was first councilor and in 1776 succeeded to the chieftaincy on the death of Netawatwees pending the minority of the hereditary chief. He encouraged the Moravian missionaries in their efforts to civilize and educate the Indians. In the Revolutionary war, as in the previous conflict between the colonists and the native tribes, he strove to keep the Delawares neutral. When the Iroquois council commanded the Delawares to take up arms for the British, he replied that he was no woman and would do as he pleased. When Captain Pipe almost persuaded his people to take the warpath in the spring of 1778, he told the warriors that he would march at their head if they were determined to go, and would seek to be the first to fall and thus avoid witnessing the utter destruction of the tribe. Compelled to declare himself, he openly espoused the American cause and joined McIntosh's expedition against the British Indians of Sandusky, but died of smallpox at Pittsburg in Nov. 1778, before the force set out. His name is also recorded Koguethagechton, Koquethagechton, and Kuckquetackton. (F. H.)

White Hair. An influential Osage chief at the beginning of the 19th century, known also as Teshuhinga, Cahagatonga, and Pahuska or Pawhuska, and by the French as Cheveux Blancs. He was head-man of the Great Osage, whose village, known also as White Hair's Village, was situated in 1806 on the E. side of Little Osage r., in the N. part of the present Vernon co., Mo. (near which Lieut. Z. M. Pike established what he called Camp Independence in 1806), and in 1825 and 1837 on the W. bank of Neosho r. in the present Neosho co., Kan., on land ceded to the United States by treaty of Sept. 29, 1865. The nominal chief of the village, according to Pike, was Casheseagra (Kóshisigré, Big Foot, or Big Track), but Clermont or Clermore (Taⁿwaⁿgahe, Builder of Towns) was the greatest warrior and most influential man, and "more firmly attached to the American interests than any other chief of the nation." He was lawful chief of the Grand Osage, but his hereditary right was usurped by White Hair while Clermont was an infant. Pike asserts that both White Hair and Casheseagra were chiefs of the trader Pierre Chouteau's creating, and neither had the power or disposition to restrain their young men from the perpetration of an improper act, lest they should render themselves unpopular. This was evident during Pike's stay in their country, when White Hair's people left to war against the whites on the Arkansas, the chief being powerless to restrain them. He treated Pike with hospitality, and sent his son, "a discontented young fellow, filled with self-pride," as an embassy with Pike's party, but he soon became tired and returned. Both White Hair and his son were presented by Pike with "grand medals." White Hair seems to be identical with Papuisea (Pahusca?), who was the first Indian signer of the treaty with the Osage at Ft Clark, Nov. 10, 1808. He signed also the treaties of Sept. 22, 1815; Sept. 25, 1818; Aug. 31, 1822; June 2, 1825; and Aug. 10, 1825. He died, probably soon after the date last mentioned, at his village in Vernon co., Mo., and was buried, in a stone tomb, on the summit of Blue Mound. The grave was afterward vandalized by treasure-seekers, and prior to 1850 the chief parts of the skeleton were taken therefrom by Judge Charles H. Allen ("Horse Allen"). About 1871 some Osage went from Kansas to Blue Mound and rebuilt the cairn formerly covering White Hair's remains, but the whites would permit neither the stones nor the few bones of the old chief to remain. The name Pawhuska survives in that of a town in Oklahoma, the present Osage agency.

White Indians. An unidentified or entirely mythic people mentioned by various early writers as existing in some part of the unexplored interior of America, and described sometimes simply as "white," but in other cases as having white skins, with beards, and clothed like Europeans. In some cases the accounts seem to be entirely mythic, based on the supposed existence of a tribe of "Welsh Indians," but in other cases they seem to refer to a settlement or temporary visitation of Europeans in the remote distance, or to the existence of an Indian tribe of somewhat lighter complexion than their neighbors. Thus the white men of whom Coronado heard in w. Texas were De Soto's party advancing from the e.; and the white men s. w. from the St Lawrence, of whom the Jesuits heard from the Indians, were probably whalers coasting along Hudson bay. The Hatteras Indians of Albemarle sd., N. C., were said to show in 1700 traces of white admixture and to claim white descent, which if present may have come from absorption of the lost colony of Roanoke in 1587. The so-called Croatian Indians base their claim on the same theory. Some of the Plain tribes, notably the Cheyenne and the Crows, are lighter in complexion than those of the woods and mountains; some, as the Mandan, are noted for the frequency of light hair and eyes; and in some, especially the Zuñi and the Hopi, albinos are somewhat common. See Croatian Indians, Popular fallacies, Welsh Indians. (J. M.)

White Lodge. A subchief of the Sisseton Sioux whose home camp was at L. Shaokaton, Lincoln co., Minn., until the outbreak of 1862, when he attacked the settlers at L. Shetak and carried away Mrs Wright and Mrs Duly with their children to the Missouri r., where they were later rescued by the "Fool Soldier band" of Teton Sioux. White Lodge escaped into Canada and died at Swift Current about 1870. (D. R.)

White Mountain Apache. Formerly the Sierra Blanca Apache, a part of the Coyoteros, so called on account of their mountain home. The name is now applied to all the Apache under Ft Apache agency, Ariz., consisting of Arivaipa, Tiltaden or Chilion, Chiricahua, Coyotero, Mimbreno, and Mogollon. In 1910 they numbered 2,269. Capt. Bourke in 1881-82 obtained at Ft Apache and San Carlos agencies the following names of bands or clans: Satchin, Destchin, Tseekadin, Tzolgan, Tuakay, Klokadakaydn, Tzintzilchut-zikadn, Tzlanapah, Tudisishn, Iyaaye, Kiyahani, Akonye, Kaynaguntl, Indelchidnti, Peiltzun, Chilchadilkloge, Natatladiltin, Tzacdelkay, Kaihatin, Mayndeshkish, Tushtun, Tzebinaste, Tutonashkisl, Yachin, Tziseketzillan, Tizessenaye, Tzecheschinne, Natootzuzn, Tutzone, Chiltneyadnaye, Yagoyekaydn, Tzetsekadn, Inoschuhochen, and Gontiel. White Pigeon (Wahbememe). A Potawatomi chief of local prominence in the early years of the 19th century. The little that is known of him is derived chiefly from tradition. It is said that about 1812, while in the neighborhood of Detroit, he learned of an uprising among the Indians and of a threatened attack on the settlement that now bears his name, in St Joseph co., Mich. Far from home and friends, he hastened to the scene of the impending trouble and by a timely warning saved the white settlers from possible massacre. He is described as tall and athletic, an unusually fleet runner, and as having possessed high ideals of truth and honor. According to Indian information he received his name because he was of much lighter complexion than the members of his tribe generally. He died at the age of about 30 years and was buried in a mound on the outskirts of the village of White Pigeon. Here, on Aug. 11, 1909, a monument, suitably inscribed, was erected to his memory under the auspices of the Alba Columba Club of women. White Pigeon signed, in behalf of his band, the Greenville treaty of Aug. 3, 1795, and the treaty of Brownstown, Mich., Nov. 25, 1808. Two of his great-grandsons and a great-granddaughter (the wife of the great-grandson of Simon Pokagon, q. v.) reside near Dorr, Mich. Consult Mich. Pion. Coll., x, 1888; [Cora Cameron,] White Pigeon, [1909].

White Raccoon's Village. A Miami village, named from the chief (Wahpahsay-pon, 'White Raccoon'), near the present Aboite, Allen co., Ind. The site was made an individual grant by treaty of Oct. 23, 1834. (J. P. D.)

White River Ute. The official collective name for such of the Ute on Uintah res., Utah (to the number of 514 in 1885), as are not classed under Uinta. It comprises the Yampa, and the Green River and Grand River Ute, as well as perhaps other bands. As officially recognized, the White River Ute under the Uinta and Ouray agency, Utah, numbered 356 in 1904 and 298 in 1910. See Uinta.

Kaviawach.—A. Hrdlička, inf'n, 1907 (or Ka-wai-ra-chi-u; their own name, having relation to their mountain abode).

White-shield, Harvey. See Hishkowits; Wopohwats.

White Swan. A Crow scout, brother of Curly, who served with Reno in the Custer campaign against the Sioux in 1876, which met with such disaster on the Little Bighorn on July 25. He received a severe wound in the retreat out of the valley, which made him a cripple for the remainder of his life. He died in the fall of 1905 and was buried with military honors in the National cemetery on the Custer battlefield in Montana. For a number of years he received a pension from the Government.

White Woman's Town. A former Delaware village near the junction of the Walhonding and the Killbuck, about 7 m. N. W. of the forks of the Muskingum, in the present Coshocton co., Ohio. The settlement was so named because a white girl, Mary Harris, who had been captured by the French Indians about the year 1710 and later became the wife of Eagle Feather, made the place her home at least as early as 1750. The Walhonding r. was known as White Woman's river, or White Woman's creek. Another white wife of Eagle Feather was known as The Newcomer, from whom Newcomerstown (q. v.) received its name.

Whullemooch ('dwellers on Puget sound'). A generic term used by the natives to designate the Salish tribes on the N. W. coast of Washington.—Deans in Am. Antiq., VIII, 41, 1886.

Wiam. A Shahaptian tribe, speaking the Tenino language, formerly living near the mouth of Deschutes r., Oreg. Their chief village was Waiam, on the Columbia r. at the site of the present Celilo. They were included in the Wasco treaty of 1855 as a "band of Walla Wallas," and were removed to the Warm Springs res., where a remnant of the tribe that numbered 130 in 1850 still survives. (L. F.)

Wi-atta-che-shah.—Prescott in Schoolcraft, Ind. Tribes, 11, 171, 1852 (trans. 'bad'; che-sha may = shicha, 'bad').

Wichita. A confederacy of Caddoan stock, closely related linguistically to the Pawnee, and formerly ranging from about the middle Arkansas r., Kansas, southward to Brazos r., Texas, of which general region they appear to be the aborigines, antedating the Comanche, Kiowa, Mescaleros, and Siouan tribes. They now reside in Caddo co., w. Okla., within the limits of the former Wichita res.

The name Wichita, by which they are commonly known, is of uncertain origin and etymology. They call themselves Kitikitish (Kirikish), a name also of uncertain meaning, but probably, like so many proper tribal names, implying pre-eminent men. They are known to the Siouan tribes as Black Pawnee (Paniwasaba, whence "Paniouassa," etc.), to the early French traders as Pani Piqué, 'Tattooed Pawnee,' to the Kiowa and Comanche by names meaning 'Tattooed Faces,' and are designated in the sign language by a sign conveying the same meaning. They are also identifiable with the people of Quivira met by Coronado in 1541. The Ouachita living in E. Louisiana in 1700 are a different people, although probably of the same stock.

Among the tribes composing the confederacy, each of which probably spoke a slightly different dialect of the common language, we have the names of the Wichita proper (?), Tawehash (Tayovayas), Tawakoni (Tawakarehu), Waco, Ysani, Akwesh, Asidabetsch, Kishkat, Korishkitau. A considerable part of the Panimaha, or Skidi Pawnee, also appear to have lived with them about the middle of the 18th century, and in fact the Pawnee and Wichita tribes have almost always been on terms of close intimacy. It is possible that the Ysani of the earlier period may be the later Waco (Bolton). The only divisions now existing are the Wichita proper (possibly synonymous with Tawehash), Tawakoni, and Waco. To these may be added the incorporated Kichai remnant, of cognate but different language. Just previous to the annexation of Texas to the United States, about 1840-5, the Tawakoni and Waco resided chiefly on Brazos r., and were considered as belonging to Texas, while the Wichita proper resided n. of Red r., in and n. of the Wichita mts., and were considered as belonging to the United States. According to the best estimates for about 1800, the Wichita proper constituted more than two-thirds of the whole body.

The definite history of the Wichita—more particularly of the Wichita proper—begins in 1541, when the Spanish explorer Coronado entered the territory known to his New Mexican Indian guides as the country of Quivira. There is some doubt as to their exact location at the time, probably about the great bend of the Arkansas r. and northeastward, in central Kansas, but the identity of the tribe seems established (consult Mooney in Harper's Mag., June 1899; Hodge in Brower, Harahey, 1899; see Quivira).

WICHITA MAN

On the withdrawal of the expedition after about a month's sojourn the Franciscan father Juan de Padilla, with several companions, remained behind to undertake the Christianization of the tribe, this being the earliest missionary work ever undertaken among the Plains Indians. After more than three years of labor with the Wichita he was killed by them through jealousy of his spiritual efforts for another tribe.

In 1719 the French commander La Harpe visited a large camp of the confederated Wichita tribes on South Canadian r., in the eastern Chickasaw Nation, Okla., and was well received by them. He estimated the gathering, including other Indians present, at 6,000 souls. They had been at war with another tribe and had taken a number of prisoners whom they were preparing to eat, having already disposed of several in this way.

They seem to have been gradually forced westward and southward by the inroads of the Osage and the Chickasaw to the positions on upper Red and Brazos rs. where they were first known to the Americans. In 1758 the Spanish mission and presidio of San Sabá, on a tributary of the upper Colorado r., Texas, were attacked and the mission was destroyed by a combined force of Comanche, Tawakoni, Tawehash, Kichai, and others. In the next year the Spanish commander Parilla undertook a retaliatory expedition against the main Wichita town, about the junction of Wichita and Red rs., but was compelled to retreat in disorder, with the loss of his train and field guns, by a superior force of Indians well fortified, and armed with guns and lances and flying the French flag. In 1760 the confederated Wichita tribes asked for peace and the establishment of a mission, and on being refused the mission, renewed their attacks about San Antonio. In 1765 they captured and held for some time a Spaniard, Tremiño, who has left a valuable record of his experiences at the main Tawehash town on Red r. In 1772 the commander Mezières visited them and other neighboring tribes for the purpose of arranging peace. From his data the Tawakoni, in two towns on Brazos and Trinity rs., may have had 220 warriors, the "Yscanis" (Waco?) 60, and the Wichita proper and "Taovayas" 600, a total of perhaps 3,500, not including the Kichai. In 1777-8 an epidemic, probably smallpox, swept the whole of Texas, including the Wichita, reducing some tribes by one-half. The Wichita, however, suffered but little on this occasion. In the spring of 1778 Mezières again visited them, and found the Tawakoni (i. e. the Tawakoni and Waco) in two towns on the Brazos with more than 300 men, and the Wichita proper in two other towns on opposite sides of Red r. (below the junction of Wichita r.), these last aggregating 160 houses, in which he estimated more than 800 men, or perhaps 3,200 souls. The whole body probably exceeded 4,000. (H. E. Bolton, infra, 1908.)

In 1801 the Texas tribes were again ravaged by smallpox, and this time the Wichita suffered heavily. In 1805 Sibley officially estimated the Tawakoni (probably including the Waco) at 200 men, the "Pans or Towinches" (Wichita proper) at 400 men, and the Kichai at 60 men, a total of about 2,600 souls, including the incorporated Kichai. An estimate by Davenport in 1809 rated the total about 2,800. A partial estimate in 1824 indicates nearly the same number. At this time the Waco town was on the site of the present Waco, while the Tawakoni town was on the E. side of the Brazos above the San Antonio road. From about this time, with the advent of the Austin colony, until the annexation of Texas by the United States, a period of about 25 years, their numbers constantly diminished in conflicts with the American settlers and with the raiding Osage from the N.

In 1835 the Wichita proper, together with the Comanche, made their first treaty with the Government, by which they agreed to live in peace with the United States and with the Osage and the immigrant tribes lately removed to Indian Ter. In 1837 a similar treaty was negotiated with the Tawakoni, Kiowa, and Kiowa Apache (Ta-wa-ka-ro, Kioway, and Ka-ta-ka, in the treaty). At this time, in consequence of the inroads of the Osage, the Wichita had their main village behind the Wichita mts., on the North fork of Red r., below the junction of Elm fork, W. Okla. In consequence of the peace thus established they soon afterward removed farther to the E. and settled on the present site of Ft Sill, N. of Lawton, Okla.; thence they removed about 1850 still farther E. to Rush Springs. The Tawakoni and Waco all this time were ranging about the Brazos and Trinity rs. in Texas. In 1846, after the annexation of Texas, a general treaty of peace was made at Council Springs on the Brazos with the Wichita proper, Tawakoni, and Waco, together with the Comanche, Lipan, Caddo, and Kichai, by which all these acknowledged the jurisdiction of the United States. In 1855 the majority of the Tawakoni and Waco, together with a part of the Caddo and Tonkawa, were gathered on a reservation on Brazos r. westward from the present Weatherford. In consequence of the determined hostility of the Texans, the reservation was abandoned in 1859, and the Indians were removed to a temporary location on Washita r., Okla. Just previous to the removal the Tawakoni and Waco were officially reported to number 204 and 171 respectively. In the meantime the Wichita had fled from the village at Rush Springs and taken refuge at Ft Arbuckle to escape the vengeance of the Comanche, who held them responsible for a recent attack upon themselves by United States troops under Major Van Dorn (1858). The Civil War brought about additional demoralization and suffering, most of the refugee Texas tribes, including the Wichita, taking refuge in Kansas until it was over. They returned in 1867, having lost heavily by disease and hardship in the meantime, the Wichita and allied tribes being finally assigned a reservation on the n. side of Washita r. within what is now Caddo co., Okla. In the next year they were officially reported at 572, besides 123 Kichai. In 1902 they were given allotments in severalty and the reservation was thrown open to settlement. The whole Wichita body numbers now only about 310, besides about 30 of the confederated Kichai remnant, being less than one-tenth of their original number.

Like all tribes of Caddoan stock the Wichita were primarily sedentary and agricultural, but owing to their proximity to the buffalo plains they indulged also in hunting to a considerable extent. Their permanent communal habitations were of conical shape, of diameter from 30 to 50 ft, and consisted of a framework of stout poles overlaid with grass thatch so as to present from a short distance the appearance of a haystack. Around the inside were ranged the beds upon elevated platforms, while the fire-hole was sunk in the center. The doorways faced e. and w., and the smoke-hole was on one side of the roof a short distance below the apex. Several such houses are still in occupancy on the former reservation. There were also drying platforms and arbors thatched with grass in the same way. The skin tipi was used when away from home. The Wichita raised large quantities of corn and traded the surplus to the neighboring hunting tribes. Besides corn they had pumpkins and tobacco. Their corn was ground upon stone metates or in wooden mortars. Their women made pottery to a limited degree. In their original condition both sexes went nearly naked, the men wearing only a breech-cloth and the women a short skirt, but from their abundant tattooing they were designated preëminently as the "tattooed people" in the sign language. Men and women generally wore the hair flowing loosely. They buried their dead in the ground, erecting a small framework over the mound.

The Wichita had not the clan system, but were extremely given to ceremonial dances, particularly the picturesque "Horn dance," nearly equivalent to the Green Corn dance of the Eastern tribes. They had also ceremonial races in which the whole tribe joined. Within recent years they have taken up the Ghost dance and Peyote rite. Their head-chief, who at present is of Tawakoni descent, seems to be of more authority than is usual among the Plains tribes. In general character the Wichita are industrious, reliable, and of friendly disposition. (J. M.)

Wickakee. One of the names of the scarlet painted-cup (Castilleia coccinea), called in Massachusetts "Indian paint-brush"; probably derived from one of the Algonquian dialects.

Wickaninnish. Originally the name of a chief, but used by authors to designate several tribes, separately and collectively, between Nootka sd., Vancouver id., and Juan de Fuca str., Brit. Col.

Wickaninnish.—Jewitt, Narr., 37, 1849. Wick-anook.—Ross, Adventures, 159, 1849 (near Nootka). Wickinnish.—Jewitt, op. cit., 76.

Wickiup. The popular name for the brush shelter or mat-covered house, of the Paiute, Apache, and other tribes of Nevada, Arizona, and the adjacent region. The name is of disputed origin, but apparently is from the Sauk, Fox, and Kickapoo wik'yap, 'lodge,' 'dwelling,' 'house.' See Habitations.

Wicopy. See Wicopy.

Wickup. A New England name, particularly in Massachusetts, of the American linden or basswood (Tilia americana), from wikop, the name of this tree in Massachuset, Chippewa, and closely related dialects of the Algonquian stock. The willow-herb (Epilobium angustifolium) is also known as wickup or Indian wickup. In this case the name is due to transference. See Wicopy. (A. F. C.)

Wicocomoco. A tribe, belonging to the Powhatan confederacy, residing on the s. side of Potomac r., at its mouth, in Northumberland co., Va. Their principal village was at the mouth of Wicocomoco r. In 1608 they numbered about 520, but in 1722 had dwindled to a few individuals, who still kept up the name and avoided intercourse with the whites and other Indians. The meaning of the name is unknown, but the last part, comoco, is the Powhatan term, in composition, for a stockaded village. (J. M.)

Wicocomocco.—Beverley, Va., 199, 1722. Wighecomoco.—Smith (1629), Va., I, map, repr. 1819. Yocomoco.—Herrman, map (1670) in Rep. on the Line between Va. and Md., 1873.

Wicocomoco. A tribe formerly living on Wicomico r., on the e. shore of Maryland, having their principal village, in 1608, on the s. bank of the river in Somerset co. They were of small stature and spoke a language different from that of the Powhatan tribes. They frequently united with the Nanticoke in attacks on the colonists, even crossing to the w. shore for this purpose, but in 1668, as a condition of peace with the English, the Nanticoke "emperor" agreed to deliver the whole Wicocomocotribe into their hands. A few mongrels still retain the name. (J. M.)

Wecamses.—Sanford, U. S., cxlviii, 1819. Wicomisses.—Md. Archiv., Proc. Council, 1667-1687, 29, 1887. Wicomess.—Map (ca. 1640) in Rep. on the Line between Va. and Md., 1873. Wicomess.—Evelin (1648) in Force, Hist. Tracts, II, 24, 1838. Wicomick.—Bozman, Md., II, 310, 1837. Wicomoco.—Calvert (ca. 1635) quoted by Schoolcraft, Ind. Tribes, VI, 131, 1857. Wighecomicoes.—Jefferson, Notes, 38, table, 1801. Wighecomoco.—Smith (1629), Va., I, 118, repr. 1819. Wighecomoco.—Smith, ibid., 129. Wighecomoco.—Schoolcraft, Ind. Tribes, VI, 131, 1857. Wighecomogo.—Domenech, Deserts, I, 445, 1860. Wycomes.—Am. Pioneer, II, 192, 1843. Wycomes.—Evelin (1648) quoted by Proud, Penn., I, 114, 1797.

Wicopy. A New England name of the moosewood (Dirca palustris), called also leatherwood on account of the strength and toughness of the bark ropes made from it in Indian fashion. The Indian word from which wicopy or wickopy is derived applies not to the leatherwood but to the stringy bark of the whitewood or basswood (Tilia americana). The origin of the word is seen in Massachuset wik'pi, Abnaki wighebi, Delaware wikbi, Chippewa wigob, and Cree wikupiy, each signifying 'inner bark,' particularly the bast of the linden. The components of this Algonquian term are: w, preformative; i, connective; and the radical top, 'inner or second bark.' Wickup is the same word. (A. F. C.)

Widja-gitunai (Wi'dja gitānā'-i, 'Gituns of the town of Widja'). A Haida family of the Eagle clan, named from its town on the n. coast of Graham id., Brit. Col., between Masset inlet and Virago sd. This with the Tohlka-gitunai, Chets-gitunai, and Djus-hade formed one larger related group. (J. R. S.)

Wi'dja gitānā'-i.—Swanton, Cont. Haida, 275, 1905. Wi'ts'a gyit'inai'.—Boas in 12th Rep. N. W. Tribes Can., 23, 1898.

Wiekagjoe (apparently a corruption of wikuajek, 'head of a creek.'—Gerard). A tribe of the Mahican confederacy dwelling on the e. bank of Hudson r. in the vicinity of Hudson, Columbia co., N. Y. Wiekagjock.—Wassenaar (1632) quoted by Rutenber, Tribes Hudson R., 71, 1872. Wiekagjocks.—Rutenber, ibid., 85.

Wieska. See Nanabozho.

Wigwam. (1) A name for an Algonquian dwelling, an arbor-like or conical structure in which, from Canada to North Carolina, was employed the same general mode of erection, which varied mainly in the plant materials (saplings, barks, rushes, or flags) used, and which differences in soil and climate changed here and there to a certain extent (see Habitations). The word, which appears in English as early as 1634 (Wood, New England's Prospect, 65, 1634) was, like the terms skunk, musquash, etc., borrowed from Abnaki by the colonists of E. Massachusetts, who adopted it as the name for an Indian habitation, in preference to the term wetu (witu) used by the natives among whom they settled. The Massachusetts Indians, like the Narraganset, used also as the name for a house the word wetuom (wituóm), formed from the same base. Eliot (Indian Grammar Begun, 11, 1666), who was ignorant of the origin of the word under consideration, mentions, we may suppose through an inadvertence, a word wekuomut (for wetuomut), which he interprets 'in his house,' and adds: "hence we corrupt this word [to] wigwam." This erroneous etymology, based on a word nonexistent in the Massachusetts dialect, and, in fact, impossible in any Algonquian dialect, has unfortunately been copied by nearly every English dictionary.

The Abnaki word wiguám, literally 'dwelling,' is from wigw, 'he dwells,' + the formative -am, from the Algonquian root wig, wik (ig, ik, in composition), 'to dwell,' and is cognate with Micmac wigwám, Mohegan wikuám, Lenape (Delaware) wikwam, and Chippewa wigwam (from wigiw, 'he dwells,' a word obsolete in Chippewa but preserved in Cree), and Nipissing wikiwám, and by change, in this dialect, of w to m, mikiwám. The Virginia Renape seem not to have employed the word wikuám used by their relatives of the N., but substituted for it the term kómük, which, like its cognates in other Algonquian dialects (Lenape gámik or kámik, Abnaki gámik, Cree and Chippewa kámik, Massachusetts kómük, Narraganset kómök, etc.), was always used in compounds, and never disjunctively. The word wigwam used by Beverley (Hist. Virginia, 1705) is merely a corruption of the northern vocable wiguám, with which he was evidently unfamiliar.

(2) A name applied by travelers to the dwellings of Indians other than those of Algonquian stock, or to the habitations of the natives of countries other than North America, as for example: "Their houses or wigwams, which they [the Caribs] call carbets" (Stedman, Exped. against the Revolted Negroes of Surinam, 1, 403, 1806); "The Fuegian wigwam resembles, in size . . . a haycock" (Darwin, Jour. of Researches, 212, 1845); "rude jackales, somewhat resembling the wigwams of the Pawnees" (Gregg, Commerce of the Prairies, 1, 286, 1851).

(3) A name applied by the founders of the Tammany Society of New York City to their headquarters.

(4) A name sometimes applied to a large structure in which a nominating convention or other political meeting takes place.

Certain summer hospital tents for children are known as "wigwams," and there is also a "wigwam shoe" or "wigwam slipper." (W. R. G. A. F. C.)

Wigwassing. A term used on the coast of New England for the operation of taking eels by torch-light; spelled also wequashing. In a letter of N. Freeman in 1792 (Mass. Hist. Soc. Coll., 1st s., 1, 231, 1806), he says: "The Indians when they go in a canoe with a torch, to catch eels in the night, call it weequash, or anglicized, wequashing." The word is a participle of a verb "to wigwas," contracted and anglicized from Massachusetts wikwes-wew, 'he illuminates it (something animate, say a fish) by burning (i. e., torching).' (W. R. G.)

Wihatset (Wi-hat'-set). A populous Chumashan village formerly at Punta Pedregosa, near Point Mugu, Ventura co., Cal.—Henshaw, Buenaventura MS. vocab., B. A. E., 1882.

Wihinasht. A division of Shoshoni, formerly in w. Idaho, n. of Snake r. and in the vicinity of Boise City. The name appears to be obsolete, the surviving Indians having been absorbed by other Shoshoni bands and now being under the Fort Hall school superintendency in Idaho. They were said to number 1,000 in 1865.

Wikoktenok (Wi'k'ōxtēnōk, 'eagle'). A clan of the Bellabella, a Kwakiutl tribe.—Boas in Rep. Nat. Mus. 1895, 328, 1897.

Wikorsh (derived from wihu, 'fat,' and koro, 'cavity,' because it is said the eyes in the cadaver of a certain bear had disappeared and some dried fat still adhered to the orbits; or from wikuru, 'netted gourd'). A Hopi clan.

Fat Cavity clan.—Voth, Traditions of the Hopi, 22, 40, 1905. Wikorsh.—Ibid., 37. Wikorsh.—Ibid.

Wiktosashki ('white-earth place'). A Tarahumare rancheria about 28 m. E. of Chinatu, w. Chihuahua, Mexico.—Lumholtz, inf'n, 1894.

Wikyuwamkamusenakata ('painted lodge'). A Cree band, taking the name of its chief, living in 1856 about Fort de Prairie, Northwest Ter., Canada.—Hayden, Ethnogr. and Philol. Mo. Val., 237, 1862.

WIKENO MAN. (AM. MUS. NAT. HIST.)

Wilakal. A village of the Agua Caliente Shoshoneans, in the San Jacinto mts., s. Cal. Under the Spanish name of this place (San Ysidro) 2 villages are mentioned in 1865 (Lovett in Ind. Aff. Rep., 125), with populations of 159 and 90, respectively. In 1880 only one is recorded, with between 50 and 75 inhabitants (Jackson and Kinney, Rep. Miss. Ind., 22, 1883). It is now included in Los Coyotes res. See Pachawal.

Wild rice. The aquatic plant (Zizania aquatica) generally known as "wild rice" has been for many generations one of the most important food producers of the Indian country about the Great Lakes and adjacent waters. The comparatively dense population in the wild-rice area and the physical well-being of the Indians there resident have been remarked by many writers. Henry in 1775 and Carver in 1778 record the fact that the great expeditions to the rivers of the W. and the preservation of the "infant colonies" beyond the settled E. would hardly have been possible without this cereal. The nomenclature of the wild-rice area is of importance, since Jenks concludes that in this limited region of North America alone "more geographic names have been derived from wild rice than from any other natural vegetal product throughout the whole continent." The plant itself is multinomial, no fewer than 60 synonyms in English, French, and the Indian tongues being cited by Jenks. The use of wild rice (which is mentioned rather late in the Jesuit Relations) seems to have been stimulated not a little by the pressure of the whites on the Indians, which forced them more and more into closer quarters in this region and cut off some of their resources, especially hunting. Wild rice is remembered in several Indian month-names and some interesting legends are connected with it. The Menominee tribe is so called from the plant. Practically all that is known about the botany of wild rice, its production and food uses, its influence on Indian life and customs, and its use by white settlers, will be found in Dr A. E. Jenks' monograph, "The Wild-Rice Gatherers of the Upper Lakes" (19th Rep. B. A. E., 1900). A list of the tribes using wild rice is there given. (A. F. C.)

Willanoucha. A former Seminole town near the head of St Marks r., probably in Leon co., Fla.

Willanoucha-talofa.—Bell in Morse, Rep. to Sec. War, 306, 1822.

Willowah. A band of the Nez Percés (q. v.) mentioned by Lewis and Clark in 1805 and formerly residing in Wallowa valley, Oreg. At that date they numbered about 500. Their descendants afterward formed Joseph's band, and were the leaders in the Nez Percé war of 1877. The majority of this band are now on Colville res., Wash., where they numbered 97 in 1909.

Willam.—Chever in Bull. Essex Inst. 1870, II, 28, 1871. Willie.—Wozencraft (1851) in Sen. Ex. Doc. 4, 32d Cong., spec. sess., 206, 1853.

Williams, Eleazar. The son of Thomas (Tehoragwanegen, q. v.) and Mary Ann Rice Williams (Konwatwenteta), born probably on the shore of L. George, N. Y., in May, 1788, died Aug. 28, 1858, on St Regis res., near Hogansburg, N. Y., neglected and in great destitution. He is said to have been one of 13 children, most of whom were born at Caughnawaga, Quebec, the home of their parents. The childhood of Eleazar passed uneventfully, as usual among children of semi-agricultural Christianized Indians. One of the early playmates of Eleazar related in after life how the latter, wearing a kind of shift as his only garment, sported about the byways of Caughnawaga, exposed to wounds from stones and thorns. Owing to a scrofulous taint in his family, these bruises and injuries left permanent scars, which later in life were increased in size by means of lashes and tartar emetic in such manner as to suggest the scars of the shackles and chains alleged to have been inflicted on him by the jailor Simon of the Tower of the Temple in Paris. In

ELEAZAR WILLIAMS. (FROM A PAINTING IN POSSESSION OF THE WISCONSIN HISTORICAL SOCIETY)

1800, his father (in opposition to the wishes of the mother, on religious grounds, she being a strict member of the Roman Catholic Church) took him and his brother John to Long Meadow, Mass., to be educated among distant relations of the father, but John soon returned home because he made no progress in his studies.

At Long Meadow the boys were left with Mr Nathaniel Ely, who had undertaken to educate them at his own expense, but financial reverses compelled Mr Ely to appeal first to missionary societies for aid, then, in 1804, to the state legislature, each time meeting with some success. In 1805 Eleazar visited Montreal; and in the following year, in company with a reputed relation, the Rev. Mr Williams, he went to Boston, where he was questioned by several ministers regarding his studies. While here he met Father Chevreux, to whom he was introduced as an Indian youth studying for the ministry. The Father questioned him, it is said, as to the practice of the Indians in adopting French children, as Williams appeared to him to have French blood. It is possible that at this interview Williams first conceived the idea that he could successfully personate the Dauphin of France. In 1807 he was at Hartford, Mass., where he met President Dwight, who gave him some salutary advice; and in May of the following year a Dr Lyman urged him to become a missionary to the Indians, a suggestion which met with Williams' hearty approval. It was in this year that Mr Ely, his friend and benefactor, died, and with his death closed the first scene of Williams' life among civilized surroundings. He lived at Mansfield and Long Meadow until Dec. 22, 1809, when he was placed under the tuition of Rev. Enoch Hale, of Westhampton, Mass., under whose guidance he remained until Aug. 1812. During this period he was commissioned to make a visit to the St Louis or Caughnawaga Indians to learn what the prospect was of introducing Protestantism among them. In 1810, owing to the condition of his health, Williams abandoned his studies and traveled in the S., where he met his future friend and bishop, Dr Hobart. Again visiting his family at Caughnawaga in the following year, he conversed with their Indian neighbors about the Protestant faith, but the Roman Catholic priests warned them not to listen to his instructions. Nevertheless, the attention shown encouraged him to enter on what was to be his life work.

Early in 1812 Williams went to Canada as an agent of the American Board of Missions, arriving at the Sault St Louis on Jan. 18; but he found it difficult to change the religious beliefs of the people. He continued his missionary tour until March, when the chiefs and counsellors made him a chief of the Iroquois at Caughnawaga, being given the name Onwarenhiiaki, probably meaning 'Tree Cutter.' In July he returned to Westhampton. At the beginning of the War of 1812, Williams, being regarded as a suitable person to aid in preventing the Indians of his tribe from espousing the cause of England, was appointed Superintendent-general of the Northern Indian Department. He was assigned to duty with Gen. Dearborn, but was transferred to service with Gen. Jacob Brown, under whom he acted in a confidential capacity, obtaining through the Canadian Indians valuable information regarding the movements of British troops. At the battle of

Plattsburgh, N. Y., Sept. 14, 1814, he was wounded. At this time he had not completed his theological studies. In Nov. 1820 Gen. A. G. Ellis went to Oneida Castle, N. Y., where Williams had resided for about 3 years as a catechist in the Episcopal Church, in order to aid the latter in teaching school. For this service Williams was to repay Ellis by instructing him in Latin, Greek, and French. Instead of being learned in these languages, however, Ellis found that Williams was ignorant of them, and that he had really been induced to live with Williams in order that the latter might be instructed in the rudiments of English. Ellis lived with Williams about 4 years, during which period the latter made no appreciable progress, not being able then, says Ellis, "to compose five lines of the English decently." Nevertheless, during his residence among the Oneida, Williams, by his persuasive eloquence in the native tongue, had induced the old Pagan party, numbering about three-fourths of the tribe, to abjure paganism. He had further induced them to grant him 100 acres of land for his own use and to sell several hundred acres more to the state to provide a fund to build a church and a school-house. The proceeds of the sale, amounting to about $4,000, were placed by the governor in the hands of Judges Williams and Miller, of Utica, to secure faithful application of the sum to the purpose mentioned. Williams, however, managing to obtain control of the expenditure of the money, erected a church at a cost of $1,200 or $1,400, for which he submitted bills covering the entire sum of $4,000, but in such equivocal shape that they would not bear examination, whereupon the two trustees resigned their trust. For many years the Oneida charged Williams with malfeasance, but the matter was never adjusted or explained. In Oct. 1820 Rev. Jedidiah Morse, who had traveled through the N. W. as far as Green Bay, Wis., presented to Williams a project for removing the New York Indians to the country w. of L. Michigan. Williams was ripe for such a venture, even claiming later that he was the originator of the scheme. In a council with the Oneida, which Morse called to discuss the proposal, Williams acted as interpreter. After the council was over, Morse asked Williams for a copy of the speech of the Oneida chief in reply, which was strongly adverse to Morse's proposal. Several days later Williams completed a fictitious speech, misrepresenting the answer of the Oneida, to which he forged the names of their chiefs. In the following year the chiefs, again in council with Morse, when Williams was not present, repudiated the Williams interpretation of the speech as "a lie from beginning to end." At this time he was at Green Bay, Wis., with a self-constituted delegation of Oneida, Onondaga, Tuscarora, and Stockbridges, negotiating a project for the removal of all the New York Indians to the country between the Mississippi and Green Bay, Wis., and the establishment among them of an empire with a single supreme head. In the furtherance of this plan in 1821 Williams visited New York and entered into negotiations with the Ogden Land Company, which then held the preemption right to most of the Indian lands in w. New York, looking to the removal of the New York Indians beyond the limits of the state, and received sums of money from time to time for the purpose of advancing the interests of the land company. Williams also busied himself at this time in enlisting the aid of missionary societies in establishing a church among the Indians at Green Bay, and carried on a voluminous correspondence with the War Department (under which the Indian affairs were then administered), in order to obtain recognition of his schemes. Aided by the Ogden Land Company, he finally obtained official permission to lead a delegation of Indians to Green Bay, representing to them that the affair was "under the patronage, protection, and with the assistance of the Government;" but when the proposal was openly made to the New York Indians in council, the Seneca and the other tribes, through the famous Red Jacket, emphatically refused their assent to the project. Nevertheless, through Williams' machinations and the powerful influence behind his schemes, a treaty was finally negotiated in 1832 by which Williams' plan was partly realized. Most of the Oneida removed to Wisconsin, but the Seneca, followed by the Tuscarora and the Onondaga, resolved to hold their lands in New York at all hazard.

When Williams removed to Green Bay in 1823 he married Miss Mary Jourdain. He had promised schools to the Indians and the French traders in consideration of their consent to establish the New York Indians among them; but having failed to redeem these pledges the missionary societies disavowed their confidence in Williams, and in 1827 appointed as missionary the Rev. Richard F. Cadle, who established a school at Menomoneeville, Wis. With the failure of the Green Bay land scheme Williams realized that he was ruined, and withdrew to his home at Kaukalin. He continued to receive aid from some of the missionary boards, since he represented himself as the missionary of the Oneida at Duck Creek, Wis., although he did not perform the duties of that station. About 1832 the Oneida, becoming wearied with the Williams incubus, held a council, to which they invited Col. George Boyd, U. S. Indian agent, in order to show him that for years Williams had failed to carry out any of his many promises; that, owing "to his want of good faith, his fraud and deceit, they were in the wilderness, utterly abandoned, without schools, churches, or religious privileges of any kind; and worse than all, that the little fund provided by the kindness of the Christian public in the East was anticipated, caught on its way to them by him, and consumed for entirely contrary purposes." At the Indians' request, the agent notified the governor of New York, the United States Government, and the missionary societies, warning the authorities that the Oneida had forever repudiated Williams, and asking that he should not be recognized as acting for them in any capacity. This indictment was so disastrous to Williams that he dropped out of sight until 1853, when he reappeared in a new rôle, that of the Dauphin of France, the Lost Prince, Louis XVII. At once he gained many credulous adherents and apologists, although it had been shown that he was "the most perfect adept at fraud, deceit, and intrigue that the world ever produced." He so far imposed on the credulity of many well-meaning persons that the Rev. John H. Hanson in 1854 published an elaborate work, entitled The Lost Prince, in support of Williams' preposterous claim, based largely on material manufactured by Williams himself. Gen. A. G. Ellis (Wis. Hist. Soc. Coll., viii, 1879) and William Ward Wight (Eleazar Williams Not the Dauphin of France, 1903) have shown the groundlessness of his claim. For Williams' published translations in the Iroquois language, see Pilling, Bibliography of the Iroquoian Languages, Bull. B. A. E., 167-168, 1888. (J. N. B. H.)

Williams Lake. A Shuswap village or band on Williams lake, which drains westward into Fraser r., Brit. Col., about lat. 52° 10'. Pop. 155 in 1910. The name is applied also to a Canadian Indian agency.

Willopah (Xwilā'pax, their name for the river). A Chinookan tribe on the lower course of Willopah r., Wash. They have been so frequently confounded with the Kwalhioqua, an Athapascan tribe living on the upper course of that stream, that the latter have usually been called Willopah. Their villages were Nayakolole, Quelaptonlit, and Talal. Along with the Kwalhioqua they ceded their lands to the United States in 1864. In 1910 there was said to be a single survivor who understood the language.

Willstown (named from the half-breed chief known to the whites as Red-headed Will). A former important Cherokee settlement on Wills cr., below Ft Payne, in De Kalb co., Ala. (J. M.)

Will'y.—Mooney in 19th Rep. B. A. E., 546, 1900 (= 'Will's place': sometimes so called). Willstown.—Doc. of 1799 quoted by Royce in 5th Rep. B. A. E., 144, 1887.

Will's Town. A former settlement of the Shawnee at the site of Cumberland, Md. After this region was deserted by the Shawnee, an Indian named Will lived a short distance from the site of the old Shawnee town at the mouth of Caiuctucuc cr. At the time of the coming of the first white settlers he was living in a cabin on the mountain side. The creek, mountain, and town were afterward named for him. Will's cr. is noted on the maps of Lewis Evans (1755) and Scull (1759, 1770), and on the map in Gist's Journal (1753). (G. P. D.)

Will's Town. A Delaware village on the E. bank of Muskingum r., at the mouth of Wills cr., in Muskingum co., Ohio. It was destroyed by the Americans in 1782.

Wiltmeet. The Dutch name of a Waranawonkong village on Esopus cr., probably near Kingston, Ulster co., N. Y. It was destroyed by the Dutch in 1660.—Ruttenber, Tribes Hudson R., 95, 128, 1872.

Wimbee. A village or band of the coast tribes of South Carolina included under the collective term Cusabo (q. v.). The only mention of the name in history seems to be in 1683, when the "chief of Wimbee" sold lands between Combahee and Broad rs. See Mills, Hist. S. C., 106, 1826, and document quoted by Rivers, Hist. S. C., 38, 1856. (J. M.)

Winamac ('catfish,' from wēē'nūd 'muddy,' māk 'a fish.'—J. P. Dunn). A principal chief of the Potawatomi in the period of the War of 1812. He was one of the signers of the noted treaty of Greenville in 1795, and of others in 1803 and 1809. In this last treaty, concluded at Ft Wayne, the Miami, Delawares, and Potawatomi sold a large tract of land in central Indiana. This so provoked Tecumseh that he threatened the life of Winamac, but there appears to have been a speedy reconciliation, as we find Winamac leading the warriors of his tribe at the battle of Tippecanoe two years later. In the War of 1812, he, with most of the Indians of the central region, joined the British side. He claimed to have caused the massacre of the surrendered garrison of Ft Dearborn, Chicago, Aug. 15, 1812, but the actual leader in the affair seems to have been Blackbird (Makahta-penashē, not to be confounded with Makatapake, Black Partridge, a friendly Potawatomi of the same period), another Potawatomi chief. Some three months later, Nov. 22, Winamac was killed in an encounter with the Shawnee chief Captain James Logan (Spemicalawba), who had espoused the cause of the Americans in the war. The name appears also as Ou-enemek (French form), Wenameac, Wenameck, Winemac, Winnemeg, Wynemac, etc. (J. M.)

Winamac. Another Potawatomi chief of the same period, the name being a common one in the tribe. Unlike his namesake, he was generally friendly to the Americans and interposed in their behalf at the Ft Dearborn massacre, although he was said to have been among the hostiles at Tippecanoe in 1811. He visited Washington several times and died in the summer of 1821. His village, commonly known by his name, was near the present Winamac, Pulaski co., Ind. See Dunn, True Indian Stories, 1909; Thatcher, Ind. Biog., 1832. (J. M.)

Winangik (Wi-nan-gik') Given by Powers (Cont. N. A. Ethnol., III, 393, 1877) as a Shoshonean tribe on the N. fork of Kern r., Cal., but there was no tribe in this region except the Tubatulabal (q. v.).

Winema ('woman chief'). A Modoc woman, better known as Toby Riddle, born in the spring of 1842. She received her name, Kaitchkona Winema (Kitchkani laki shuawedsh, 'female sub-chief'), because, when a child, she guided a canoe safely through the rapids of Link r. She justified her title when, but 15 years of age, she rallied the Modoc warriors as they took to flight when surprised by a band of Achomawi. After she grew up she became the wife of Frank Riddle, a miner from Kentucky. When the Modoc left Klamath res. in 1872 to return to Lost r. he served as interpreter to the various commissions that treated with them. After they had fled to the lava-beds and had defeated a detachment of soldiers, the Government decided to send a commission of men known to be in sympathy with them to arrange a peace. Winema warned Commissioner Meacham of the murderous temper of some of Captain Jack's followers (see Kintpuash). Meacham was convinced and told his fellow-commissioners, Gen. Edward R. S. Canby and Rev. E. Thomas, that they were going to their death, but could not swerve them from their purpose. Shonchin (q. v.), the shaman, threatened to kill her unless she confessed who had betrayed the plot, but she declared that she was not afraid to die, and Captain Jack forbade him to shoot a woman. When Gen. Canby refused to withdraw the troops from the lava-beds, the Modoc chief gave the signal, and Canby and Thomas fell instantly. Shonchin then turned his rifle upon Meacham. Winema, who was present as interpreter, pleaded for the life of the man who, when Indian superintendent, had presented to white men living with Indian women the alternative of legal marriage or criminal prosecution. She seized the chief's wrists and thrust herself between the assassins and the victim, and when he dropped from several bullet wounds and a Modoc seized his hair to take the scalp Winema cried out that the soldiers were coming, whereupon they all fled. When the soldiers came at last, she advanced alone to meet them. Meacham, crippled and invalided, afterward took Winema with her son and Riddle, one of the two whites who escaped from the massacre, to the E. to continue his intercession in behalf of the Indians, especially the Modoc, who had so perfidiously requited his previous benevolence. For her portrait, see Modoc. Consult Meacham, Wi-ne-ma, the Woman Chief, 1876. (F. H.)

Wingandacoa. A term which, like "Assamocomoco," was once supposed to be the native name of Virginia. In his report (made in 1584) to Sir Walter Raleigh, Capt. Arthur Barlowe, in narrating what occurred after his landing at the island of Wococon (now Ocracoke), states that on the fourth day he was visited by "diuers boates" with "fortie or fiftie men," among whom was the brother of the ruler of the country, and then proceeds to say: "His name was Granganimeo, and the king is called Wingina, and the county Wingandacoa, and now by her Majestie Virginia." Subsequently, Sir Walter Raleigh, in mentioning the fact that Yucatan, Peru, and Paria are but words in native languages which the Spaniards mistook for place-names, remarks: "The same happened among the English which I sent under Sir Richard Grenville [a slip of the memory for Captains Amidas and Barlowe] to inhabit Virginia. For when some of my people asked the name of the country, one of the savages answered Wingandacoa, which is as much as to say, 'You wear good clothes' or 'gay clothes.'" From this it would seem that when the English interrogator asked a native, by signs, the name of the country, he accidentally embraced in his gestures, intended to include everything in sight, the clothing which he wore. The Indian therefore laconically answered: "Wingatakw," which means simply 'excellent fibrous material.' (W. R. G.)

Wingatakw. The term for which the impossible "Wingandacoa" is a corruption due to a mishearing; from wing, 'good,' 'excellent,' and the nominal termination -takw (of which the sound of the w can not be expressed by type), 'fibrous stuff.'

It is from the secondary root tak, meaning in composition 'fiber,' and, by extension, anything made of fiber, as thread, twine, rope, band, girdle, etc. By a slight dialectic change the termination becomes in Massachusetts -takun, -takun, found in the name Wautakon or Wautakun, which the Massachusetts Indians applied to an Englishman, and which the English colonists supposed to mean 'coat.' (W. R. G.)

Wingina (abbrev. of Winginaum, 'he approves,' 'is pleased with,' or 'looks at with complaisance.'—Gerard). The principal chief of the Secotan tribe at the time of Raleigh's first and second expeditions to North Carolina. He was the son of Ensenore and brother of Granganimeo. After the death of the latter, shortly after the arrival of the colonists of 1585, and of the former in the spring of 1586, Wingina, no longer restrained by the influence of these two relatives, who had been friendly to the English, laid plans in secret to destroy the colony. His designs proved abortive, however, and eventually led to his own death. Lane states that Wingina, after the death of his brother, changed his name to Pemisapan.

Winnebago (winipig, 'filthy water' [Chippewa]; winipigahag, 'people of the filthy water' [Sauk and Fox].—W. J.) A tribe of the Siouan linguistic family.

Habitat and History.—The Winnebago have been known to the whites since 1634, when the Frenchman Nicollet found them in Wisconsin, on Green bay, at which time they probably extended to L. Winnebago. At this period they were found wedged in by Central Algonquian tribes, particularly by the Sauk and Foxes and the Menominee. To the w. they were in intimate contact with a kindred tribe, the Iowa, who in turn were neighbors of the Oto and Missouri. These four tribes, the Winnebago, Iowa, Oto, and Missouri, speak dialects naturally intelligible to one another, and show many cultural similarities. On the other hand, the Winnebago show many cultural similarities with their Central Algonquian neighbors, particularly in all that pertains to material culture and art, and this double influence, that from their Siouan neighbors and that from their Algonquian neighbors, must be borne in mind in any attempt to understand properly the Winnebago culture.

It is stated in the Jesuit Relation for 1671 (42, 1858) that the Winnebago had always dwelt in the Green Bay region.

Allouez spent the winter of 1669-70 at Green Bay, preaching to the Potawatomi, Menominee, Sauk, Foxes, and Winnebago, whom he found commingled there. The map of 1681 accompanying Marquette's Journal notes a Winnebago village near the s. end of L. Winnebago. At a very early date, it is stated in the Jesuit Relation for 1671, they were almost entirely destroyed by the Illinois, but all captives were at last allowed to return and form a tribe again. Jefferys (1761) refers to them and the Sauk as living toward the head of Green bay. Carver (1778) speaks of "the great town of the Winnebagoes situated on a small island, just as you enter the e. end of L. Winnebago." A "queen," he says, presided then over the tribe. Pike (1806) states that they resided on Wisconsin, Rock, and Fox rs. and Green bay in 7 villages, situated at the entrance and at the end of Green bay, at L. Poygan, and L. Puckway, at the portage of the Wisconsin, and at two places on Rock r. They had a war with the Chippewa in 1827, but this was of short duration. By the treaty of Prairie du Chien in 1825 and another treaty in 1832 they ceded all their lands s. of Wisconsin and Fox rs. in return for a reservation on the w. side of the Mississippi above upper Iowa r. One of their villages in 1832 was at La Crosse, Wis. Smallpox visited the tribe twice before 1838, and in that year more than one-fourth of the people died. In 1837 they relinquished the title to their old country s. of Mis-

Mississippi r., and in 1840 removed to the Neutral Ground in the territory of Iowa, though a part of the tribe had to be removed by soldiers. They were in 1843 on the Neutral Ground in different bands, the principal one, called the School band, on Turkey r. In 1846 they surrendered their reservation for one N. of Minnesota r. in Minnesota, and in 1848 removed to Long Prairie res., bounded by Crow Wing, Watab, Mississippi, and Long Prairie rs., Minn. Schoolcraft said that the tribe was composed of 21 bands in 1852, having a total population of 2,521 souls. They lost many of their number by disease and were kept on the reservation only by force. In 1853 they were removed to Crow r., and in 1856 to Blue Earth, Minn., where they were just getting a start in civilization when the Sioux war of 1862 broke out, and the people of Minnesota demanded their removal. They were taken to Crow Creek res., S. Dak., on Missouri r., but could not be kept there by the troops. There was much suffering from sickness and other causes. Out of the 2,000 taken to Crow cr. only 1,200 reached the Omaha res., whither they fled for protection. They were then assigned a new reservation on the Omaha lands in N. E. Nebraska, where they have since remained and where their lands have been allotted to them in severalty. When the tribe was removed by force from Minnesota to Crow cr. in 1863, many who had taken up farms remained.

How long the tribe had maintained its position at Green bay previous to the coming of the whites is unknown. As has been seen, it appears they had receded slightly toward the W. before 1766, the time of Carver's visit, who found them on Fox r. The French found them in league with the Menominee, and the 2 tribes gave shelter to the Potawatomi and the Ottawa, who had been driven from their homes by the Iroquois, and also to the Sauk and Fox tribes when these were expelled from S. Michigan. Notwithstanding their friendly relations with the last named, who were the only Algonquian tribes with whom the French had strife, the Winnebago managed to maintain friendship and uninterrupted trade with the French. They generally kept on friendly terms also with their neighbors, the Chippewa, Ottawa, Potawatomi, Kickapoo, and Mascoutens, to do which required great address, as the Sauk and Foxes seem to have been cut loose from their ancient and natural affinities and were perpetually making inroads on Algonquian tribes, particularly, in conjunction with the Sioux, on the Chippewa (Schoolcraft). After the fall of the French power in Canada in 1760 the Winnebago were slow to transfer their allegiance to Great Britain, but when they did they remained firm in their new fealty. When the United States declared their independence in 1776, the Winnebago sided with the Crown, and in all questions of local jurisdiction were arrayed on the side of the British. In the War of 1812 they espoused the cause of England, helped to defeat Col. Crogan at Michilimackinac, Col. Dudley at the rapids of the Miami, and Gen. Winchester at the River Raisin, and were with the tribes that gathered about Detroit. In the years immediately following this war they became insolent. Hoochoop, a chief of the tribe, living at the outlet of L. Winnebago, assumed to be the keeper of Fox r. valley and sometimes levied toll for the privilege of ascent. This people also connected themselves clandestinely with the Sauk and Foxes in the Black Hawk war of 1832. Since that time they have been uniformly peaceable.

Language.—The Siouan dialect spoken by the Winnebago is intimately related to Oto, Iowa, and Missouri, more distantly to Dakota, and still more distantly to Ponca. Its relationship to the northern Siouan dialects (Crow, Hidatsa, and Mandan), to the southern (Biloxi), and eastern (Catawba and Tutelo), is not as yet definitely known. The characteristics of the Winnebago dialect are, grammatically, a strong development of the classifiers of position, and, phonetically, the insertion of vowels between consonantal clusters and the change of the Dakota and Omaha t, d, and m, to tc, dj, and w. (See Handbook of Am. Ind. Languages, Bull. 40, B. A. E., part 1).

Social Organization.—The Winnebago social organization is based on two phratries, known, respectively, as the Upper or Air, and the Lower or Earth, divisions. The Upper division contains four clans, Thunderbird, War People, Eagle, and Pigeon (extinct), and the Lower division eight clans, the Bear, Wolf, Water-spirit, Deer, Elk, Buffalo, Fish, and Snake. An Upper individual must marry a Lower individual, and vice versa. While there is no law restricting marriage between the clans of the two phratries, there is some evidence showing a tendency of certain clans to intermarry. The Thunderbird and Bear clans are regarded as the leading clans of their respective phratries. Both have definite functions. The lodge of the former is the peace lodge, over which the chief of the tribe presides, and in which disputes between Indians are adjudicated. No person could be killed in the lodge, and an offender or prisoner escaping to it was protected as long as he was within its precincts. The lodge of the Bear clan was the war or disciplinary lodge: prisoners were killed, and offenders punished in its precincts. Besides these functions, the Bear clan possessed the right of "soldier killing," and was in charge of both ends of the camping circle during the hunt. Each clan has a large number of individual customs, relating to birth, the naming feast, death, and the funeral wake. The chief item of interest in this connection is the fact that a member of one clan cannot be buried by the members of another clan of the same phratry. (For details of the social organization, see Radin in Am. Anthr., xii, no. 2, 1910.)

Religion.—The Winnebago possess two important tribal ceremonies, the Mañ-káni or Medicine Dance, and the Winter Feast (Wagigó). The Medicine Dance can take place only in summer, and the Winter Feast only in winter. The Medicine Dance is a secret society, ungraded, into which men and women can be initiated on payment of a certain amount of money. Supernatural dreams are not required for initiation at the present day. A new member generally succeeds some deceased relative. There are five ceremonial bands, occupying, respectively, the east, north, west, south, and southeast of the long tent in which the ceremony is performed. The positions of honor, which follow in the manner enumerated above, are dependent on the order of invitation and may differ at each performance. A secret vapor-bath ceremony precedes, and a secret ceremony intervenes between, the first and second parts of the general ceremony. The general ceremony itself is public. The purpose of the society is the prolongation of life and the instilling of certain virtues, none of which, however, relate to war. This instilling is accomplished by means of the "shooting" ceremony, consisting of the simulated shooting of a shell, contained in an otter-skin bag, into the body of the one to be initiated. This ceremony is extremely similar to that in the Algonquian Midéwiwin, and to that in the Dakota "Mystery Dance" and the Omaha "Pebble Ceremony." There seems little doubt that the shooting ceremony has been borrowed by the Winnebago from some Central Algonquian tribe, presumably the Sauk and Foxes; also that the teachings have been greatly influenced by those of the Midéwiwin. On the other hand, the organization, a large portion of the ritual, and the ritualistic myths are so fundamentally different that it is better to regard the shooting ceremony as a ritual secondarily associated with an old Winnebago ceremony.

The Winter Feast is the only distinctly clan ceremonial among the Winnebago. Each clan has a sacred clan bundle, which is in the hands of some male individual, who hands it down from one generation to another, always taking care, of course, to keep it in the same clan. The Winter Feast is distinctly a war feast, and the purpose in giving it seems to be a desire to increase their war powers by a propitiation of all the supernatural deities known to them. To these they offer food and deerskin. There may be as many as twelve (?) powers propitiated, namely, Earth-maker, Disease-giver, Sun, Moon, Morning Star, the spirits of the Night, Thunderbird, One-horn, the Earth, the Water, the Turtle, and the Rabbit. Of these, food had to be offered to all except the last two, who are really only the culture heroes and probably of recent introduction. The feast is divided into two distinct parts, one for the Disease-giver and one for all the other spirits. The Sauk and Foxes seem to have a similar feast, but its relation to the Winnebago is as yet unknown.

There are a number of important ceremonies besides the above, of which the best known are the Buffalo Dance and the Herucka. The former is given in spring, and has for its purpose the magical calling of the buffalo herds. All those who have had supernatural communication with the Buffalo spirit may become members, irrespective of clan. The Herucka is the same as the Omaha Grass dance. There are also a number of other dances and feasts, of which little is known as yet, such as the Snake, Scalp, Grizzly-bear, Sore-eye, and Ghost dances.

The religious beliefs of the Winnebago are practically identical with those of the Dakota, Ponca, and Central Algonquian tribes. A figure known as Ma'una (Earth-maker) corresponds to the Gitchi Manito of the Central Algonquian tribes. The mythology consists of large cycles relating to the five personages whom Earth-maker sent out to free the world from giants and evil spirits. They are the Trickster, the Bladder, the Turtle, He-who-wears-heads-as-earrings, and the Hare. Besides these there are numerous myths relating to the Thunderbird and other clan heroes, and likewise numerous miscellaneous myths. Although there are evidences of Central Algonquian influence, the mythology shows a much more intimate relation with that of the other Siouan tribes.

Material Culture.—In their material culture the Winnebago are distinctly timber people, and their houses and dress are practically identical with those of the Sauk and Foxes, Menominee, and others. The same applies to their beadwork, although there is considerable evidence to show that they had a characteristic porcupine-quill industry not very long ago. In their clothing, moccasins, cooking utensils, arms, and in other respects, they show marked individual characteristics which, however, have not been investigated as yet.

The population was estimated by Pike at 1,750 in 1806; by Morse at 5,800 in 1820; in 1837 and again in 1843 their number was given at 4,500. In 1867 there were 1,750 on the Nebraska res. and 700 in Wisconsin. In 1876 there were 1,463 on the Nebraska res. and 860 in Wisconsin; but 204 of the latter removed in 1877 to Nebraska. In 1886 there were 1,222 in Nebraska and 930 in Wisconsin, and in 1910 there were 1,063 in Nebraska and 1,270 in Wisconsin.

The gentes as given by Dorsey are as follows: 1. Shungikikarachada ('Wolf'); 2. Honchikikarachada ('Black Bear'); 3. Huwanikikarachada ('Elk'); 4. Wakanikikarachada ('Snake'); 5. Waninkikikarachada ('Bird'), including: (a) Hichakhshepara ('Eagle'), (b) Ruchke ('Pigeon'), (c) Kerechun ('Hawk'), (d) Wakanchara ('Thunderbird'); 6. Cheikikarachada ('Buffalo'); 7. Chaikikarachada ('Deer'); 8. Wakchekhiikikarachada ('Water-monster').

The Winnebago had a number of villages, those whose names are known being Prairie la Crosse, Sarrochau, Spotted Arm's village, Village du Puant, Wuckan, Yellow Thunder. (J. O. D. P. R.)

Winnebago. An Indian village on Wildcat cr., Ind., destroyed by the troops under Gen. Hopkins in 1812; named for the Winnebago tribe, which was largely represented among the followers of Tenskwatawa, The Prophet. It contained "about forty houses, many of them from thirty to fifty feet in length, besides many temporary huts in the surrounding prairie. The settlement was situated on what is now known as the Langlois reserve, adjoining the city of Lafayette. It was often called Village du Puant, because the French called the Winnebago Puans, i. e. 'fetid.' (J. P. D.)

Winnebegoshishiwininewak ('people on Winnibigashish lake'). A division of the Chippewa formerly living on L. Winnibigashish, Minn.

Winnecowet. A tribe or band, connected with the Pennacook confederacy, formerly living in Rockingham co., N. H.—Potter quoted by Schoolcraft, Ind. Tribes, v, 223, 1855.

Winnefelly. An unidentified Calapooya band that participated in the Dayton treaty of 1855.—U. S. Ind. Treat., 18, 1873.

Winnemeg. See Winamac.

Winnemucca, Sarah. A woman of the Paviotso of w. Nevada, commonly called a Paiute, born in 1844 in the vicinity of Humboldt lake, and known after marriage as Sarah Winnemucca Hopkins. Her father, Winnemucca, was chief of the band that lived about Humboldt and Pyramid lakes, sometimes spoken of as Winnemucca's band (q. v.). Her grandfather, who was also a chief, accompanied Gen. Frémont into California and was named by this officer "Captain Truckee," by which designation he was afterward known to the whites until his death, about 1859. In 1860 Sarah and her sister were taken to San José, Cal., and placed in the Sisters' school, where they were allowed to remain but a few weeks; in the same year the band which included her people was confined to lands about Pyramid lake, which, in 1864, were formed into a reservation. In the following year the family lived at Dayton, Nev., and it was at this time, or shortly afterward, that Sarah's mother and sister Mary died. About 1868 Sarah began to act as interpreter for Agent Bateman to the Shoshoni, and later became interpreter and scout for Gen. O. O. Howard's forces during the Paiute and Bannock war of 1877, when no Indian man could be prevailed on to risk the attendant danger, and was instrumental in bringing her father and his immediate band out of the hostile Bannock camp in Oregon. On Jan. 26, 1880, she was appointed interpreter at Malheur agency, Oreg., and in 1881 conducted a school for Indian children at Vancouver barracks, Wash. In the winter of 1879-80 she accompanied her father to Washington for the purpose of obtaining permission for the return of their people from the Yakima to the Malheur res., which was granted by the Secretary of the Interior, but the plans for carrying it into effect were thwarted by the Yakima agent. In 1881-82 she again visited the East, delivering public lectures in Boston and other cities with the object of making known the story and the trials of her people and of arousing sympathy in their behalf, her complaints being directed principally against the Indian agents. To aid in this effort she wrote a book under the title "Life Among the Piutes, Their Wrongs and Claims," published in 1883. In the meantime, late in 1881 or early in 1882, she married a Lieutenant Hopkins. Although Sarah's attacks on the Indian agents with whom she had to deal brought forth countercharges against her character, these were met and refuted by Gen. Howard and other military officers whom she had aided in the field.

With aid received during one of her visits to Boston lands were purchased for her near the present Lovelock, Nev., and an Indian school was established, which she conducted for 3 years. Here her husband died of tuberculosis and was buried in Lone Mountain cemetery. Sarah thereupon abandoned the school and went to visit her sister in Monida, Mont., where she died Oct. 16, 1891 (inf'n from Miss Jeanne Elizabeth Wier, Reno, Nev., 1905). She was degenerate in her later years.

Winnemucca's Band. A Paviotso band, under chief Winnemucca ('The Giver'), formerly dwelling on Smoke cr., near Honey lake, N. E. Cal., and eastward to Pyramid, Winnemucca, and Humboldt lakes, Nev.; said to number 155 in 1859. In 1877 they were under Malheur agency, Oreg., numbering 150. Winoack. The common name of the single village of the Nottoway in 1701 (Lawson, 1709, N. C., 383, 1860) on Nottoway r. (see Weanoc), and on the s. border of Virginia, in Southampton co.

Winona ('first-born child' [if a girl], in the Santee dialect). The chief village of the Kiyuksa band of Mdewakanton Sioux, succeeded by the present town of Winona, Winona co., Minn. The name was introduced to the reading public by Keating, who relates, in his Narrative of Long's expedition to St. Peters r., published in 1823, the story of a Sioux maiden who committed suicide because her relatives sought to make her marry against her will. See Wenona.

Wintun ('Indians,' 'people'). One of the 2 divisions of the Copehan family, the other being the Patwin. The Wintun territory was bounded on the n. by Mt Shasta and the domain of the Lutuamian and Shastan families; on the s. by a line running from the e. boundary, about 10 m. E. of Sacramento r., due w. through Jacinto and the headwaters of Stony cr., Colusa co., Cal., to Kulanapan territory. The e. boundary began at the headwaters of Bear cr., bearing s. some miles E. of and parallel to McCloud r. From Pit r. to the neighborhood of Redding they occupied a triangular area E. of the Sacramento. On the w. the Wintun territory was bounded by that of the Kulanapan, Yukian, Chimarikan, and Quoratean families, and the Wailaki tribe.

The Wintun division of the Copehan family is rather homogeneous, the language, customs, and characteristics of the tribes presenting comparatively slight variations. Powers thought the Wintun were originally a sort of metropolitan tribe for the whole of n. California below Mt Shasta. Physically they were inclined to obesity; they were indifferent hunters but good fishermen, and were abundantly supplied with dried salmon. Roots of various kinds, manzanita berries, piñon nuts, and acorns were used as food; and according to Powers clover was eaten in great quantities in the blossoming season.

Dancing was a favorite amusement. Wintun marriage was of the simplest character and the man seldom paid for his bride. The dead were buried in ordinary graves, the bodies being doubled up and wrapped in mats or skins. The Wintun language presents many agreements with that of the Patwin division, vocabularies showing about a third of the words to be common to both. For the Wintun subdivisions, see Copehan Family.

Khatukeyu.—A. L. Kroeber, inf'n, 1905 (name given by Shasta of Salmon r.). Wawah.—Powers, *Inds. of W. Winyaw. One of the small tribes living on lower Pedee r. and its tributaries in South Carolina. Of their language nothing is known, and very little else is recorded concerning them, as they were never prominent in history. It is supposed, however, from their associations that they were of Siouan affinity. They dwelt on the w. side of the Pedee near its mouth, about opposite the Waccamaw. The 2 tribes were first mentioned in 1715 as being neighbors and as receiving ammunition from the Cheraw, who attempted to induce them to join in a league against the English. Gov. Johnson in 1715 reported them as having one village, with a population of 106. After this they drop from history, becoming extinct as a tribe.

Wishosk. A small tribe, whose name Powell adopted for the Wishoskan linguistic family, on the coast of n. California about Humboldt bay. The word seems to be a misapplication of their own name for their Athapascan neighbors, Wishashk. Wiyot (see below), which has sometimes been used as an equivalent, is therefore probably a better term than Wishosk, though not entirely exact. The Wishosk territory extended from the mouth of Mad r., lat. 41°, to a short distance above Blue Lake; thence the boundary followed the watershed, between the streams that flow into Humboldt bay and those that drain into Mad and Eel rs., southward to Eel r., probably slightly below Fortuna (though some accounts make the Wishosk territory extend up Eel r. to the mouth of Van Duzen fork), and across it to the Bear River range, which formed the southern boundary, back to the coast perhaps 5 or 6 m. n. of C. Mendocino. This territory included Lindsey, Jacoby, Freshwater, and Salmon crs., and Elk and Salt rs. The entire stretch of the country of the Wishosk is scarcely 30 m., and the greatest breadth is not more than 12 or 14 m. As this limited territory is heavily timbered with redwood, the people lived almost exclusively along the edge of salt water or on the banks of the two larger rivers flowing into the ocean in their domain. For this reason the Wishosk probably depended less on acorns for food than most of the tribes of California, products of the sea, including the fish that ran up the streams, constituting their chief source of subsistence.

The Wishosk were surrounded on the land side by Athapascan tribes, except at the n., where lower Mad r. formed the boundary between themselves and the coast Yurok. The Wishosk call the Athapascan languages Wishi'lak, the Yurok language Denákwatelik. For themselves as a body they have, like the other tribes of n. w. California, no geographic or specific name, calling themselves simply 'people.' They call their language, however, as distinct from other languages, Sulá'telik. They recognize 3 divisions in their country: the territories about Mad r., Humboldt bay, and Eel r., which they call Batawa't, Wiki', and Wi'yat, respectively. On the addition of -daredalitl these terms denote the people of the districts; thus Wiki-daredalitl are the people living on Humboldt bay. These, however, are only geographically natural and convenient names, and did not reflect any real political divisions. As was customary in n. w. California the only organization of a political or social nature that they possessed consisted of village settlements. They showed no trace of a totemic or gentile system. They spoke only one dialect; the distinction between the Viard and the Wiyot rests on faulty orthography. The general name for them and their country among the neighboring tribes is some form of the word Wiyot; the Yurok call them Weyet; the Karok, Waiyat; the Sinkyone, the Athapascans about the lower s. fork of Eel r., call them Dilwishne and their country Weyat.

The whole Humboldt bay region was rapidly settled by the whites after 1850. The Wishosk suffered considerably at their hands, a large party being massacred on Indian id., near Eureka, on a mistaken suspicion. The numbers of the Wishosk were placed at 800 in 1853, but all figures are only estimates. At present there survive about 70, who live in their original country without recognition by the Government, supporting themselves by civilized labor.

In general culture the Wishosk resembled the tribes of the lower Klamath and Trinity. They had square board houses with gabled roofs built about excavations, redwood canoes, and twined basketry, similar in all essentials to those of the Yurok, Karok, and Hupa. The women also tattooed their chins. They lacked the Deerskin dance and the Jumping or Woodpecker dance of these three tribes. They had a puberty ceremony for girls, that included dancing. According to their mythology the creator was Gudatrigakwitl, 'Above-old-man.' This deity is more distinctly a creator than most of the corresponding mythological characters of other tribes of n. w. California. On the whole but little is known about the religion of the Wishosk. Their language is also very little known. It is complex and obscure, and appears to resemble the adjacent Yurok in general structure, but to be an entirely unrelated and independent family. (A. L. E.)

Dilwishne.—A. L. Kroeber, inf'n, 1904 (Sinkyone name for the Wishosk and their language). Humbolt Bay Indians.—U. S. Stat., XII, 199, 1863. Koquilth.—Powers in Cont. N. A. Ethnol., III, 100, 1877 (given as a Wishosk division). Ko-wilth.—Powell, ibid., 478. Ock-co-wilth.—Buchanan (1853) in H. R. Ex. Wishoskan Family. A linguistic family represented by the Wishosk Indians (q. v.).

> Wish-osk.—Gibbs in Schoolcraft, Ind. Tribes, III, 422, 1853 (given as the name of a dialect on Mad r. and Humboldt bay). — Wish-osk.—Powell in Cont. N. A. Ethnol., III, 478, 1877 (vocabularies of Wish-osk, Wi-yot, and Ko-wilth); Gatschet in Mag. Am. Hist., 162, 1877 (indicates area occupied by family); Gatschet in Beach, Ind. Misc., 437, 1877. > Wee-yot.—Gibbs in Schoolcraft, Ind. Tribes, III, 422, 1853 (given as the name of a dialect on Eel r. and Humboldt bay). X Weitspek.—Latham in Trans. Philol. Soc. Lond., 77, 1856 (includes Weyot and Wishosk); Latham, Opuscula, 343, 1860. < Klamath.—Keane in Stanford, Compend., Cent. and So. Am., 475, 1878 (cited as including Patawats, Weeyots, Wishosks). = Wishoskan.—Powell in 7th Rep. B. A. E., 132, 1891.

Wishram. Formerly the principal village of the Tlakluit, and now their chief fishing settlement; situated on Columbia r., about 5 m. above The Dalles, in Washington. It is said to have contained as many as 400 inhabitants at one time, but now fewer than 150, the total population of the tribe, live there.

Niculuita.—Wilkes in U. S. Expl. Exped., IV, 388, 1845. Nixlu'idix.—Edward Sapir, inf'n, 1908 (proper name). Wisham.—Wilkes, op. cit. Wishqum.—Mooney in 14th Rep. B. A. E., 740, 1896. Wushuum.—Dorsey in Am. Anthr., VIII, 475, 1906.

Wishtonwish. A species of prairie-dog, Cynomys ludovicianus, of the Missouri region and westward and southward. These animals utter a sharp chirp, which is called barking, and hence their name of "dog." They live in burrows, and large numbers are often found in the same locality, forming communities which hunters call "dog towns." The name under consideration was applied by the Caddoan tribes of Louisiana from the cry uttered by the animals. "As you approach their towns," says Lieut. Pike, "you are saluted on all sides by the cry of 'wishtonwish' (from which they derive their name with the Indians), uttered in a shrill and piercing manner." J. Fenimore Cooper, in his works "The Wept of Wishtonwish" and "The Last of the Mohicans" erroneously applied the name to the whippoorwill. (W. R. G.)

Wiskala ('sand.'—Kroeber). A former village of the Awani at the foot of the "Royal Arches"; it was the uppermost village in Yosemite valley, Mariposa co., Cal.

Wiscúlla.—Powers in Overland Mo., x, 333, 1874. Wiskala.—A. L. Kroeber, inf'n, 1905. Wis-kul'-la.—Powers in Cont. N. A. Ethnol., III, 365, 1877.

Wiskinky. One of the officers or governing council of the Tammany Society (q. v.) of the city of New York. William Mooney, the founder of the society, borrowing the general scheme of the organization from the Saint Tammany societies already in existence, called its meeting-place the "wigwam"; its head, the "great father" (afterward the "grand sachem"); its council of twelve, "sachems"; its master of ceremonies, a "sagamore"; and its doorkeeper a "wiskinkie." This last-named word was obtained by Mooney from Capt. Carver's Travels, which had been published shortly previous to the organization of the society, and in which, in an Old Algonkin vocabulary, it appears, in the form wiskinkhie, as a name for 'eyes' (lit. 'his eye'). (W. R. G.)

Wissatinnewag. A village, apparently on Connecticut r., in central Massachusetts in 1663.—Pynchon (1663) in N. Y. Doc. Col. Hist., XIII, 308, 1881.

Wissomanchuh. A former Hupa village on or near Trinity r., Cal.

Wis'-so-man-chuh.—Powers in Cont. N. A. Ethnol., III, 73, 1877.

Wistonwish. See Wishtonwish.

Witaotina ('dwellers on the island'). A Wahpeton Sioux band.—Dorsey (after Ashley) in 15th Rep. B. A. E., 216, 1897.

Witawaziyataotina ('village at the north island'). A Sisseton Sioux band.

Witawaziyata.—Ashley, letter to Dorsey, Jan. 18, 1886. Wita-waziyata-otina.—Dorsey in 15th Rep. B. A. E., 216, 1897.

Wetohá.—Speck, Yuchi Inds., 70, 1909. Witchá'h tahá.—Gatschet, Uchee MS., B. A. E., 1885 (= 'turkey gens').

Witchcraft. Witchcraft may be defined as the art of controlling the will and well-being of another person by supernatural or occult means, usually to his detriment. If shamans possessed supernatural powers that could be exerted beneficially, it was naturally supposed that they might also be exerted with injurious results, and therefore where shamanism was most highly developed the majority of supposed witches, or rather wizards, were shamans. At the same time it was believed that anybody might practice witchcraft if he knew the proper formulæ, and, in spite of the fact that a shaman is often represented as causing sickness in order to bring himself practice, the distinction between the legitimate exercise of shamanistic powers and witchcraft seems always to have been recognized.

One mode of bewitching was similar to that employed in Europe and New England. The wizard would possess himself of a lock of the victim's hair, parings from his nails, some of his saliva, a bit of the clothing he had worn, especially such as had absorbed his perspiration, a fragment left after he had eaten, some of his implements, or other personal belongings, and by treating them in certain ways would bring on him local or general sickness or some other misfortune. It was said that the wizard could affect any part if he obtained something taken from it. Thus sore throat might be brought about or a man made to "spit himself to death" by means of a little saliva, and headache might be induced through a few hairs. A Tlingit wizard having obtained one of these articles would make a little image of his victim and torture it in just that part which he desired to harm. A woman envious of another who was a good weaver might try to destroy her skill by torturing the hands of the effigy, and so with other parts. Very much the same custom was recorded by Alexander Henry among the Chippewa, except that the figure was outlined in sand, ashes, or clay. The Kwakiutl wizard stuffed articles obtained from his victim into the mouth, nose and ears of a corpse, or in a more elaborate form of bewitching, called ē'k'a, into human bones and skulls. Dawson's description of this particular form is as follows:

"An endeavor is first made to procure a lock of hair, some saliva, a piece of the sleeve and of the neck of the dress, or of the rim of the hat or headdress which has absorbed the perspiration of the person to be bewitched. These are placed with a small piece of the skin and flesh of a dead man, dried and roasted before the fire, and rubbed and pounded together. The mixture is then tied up in a piece of skin or cloth, which is covered over with spruce gum. The little package is next placed in a human bone, which is broken for the purpose, and afterwards carefully tied together and put within a human skull. This again is placed in a box, which is tied up and gummed over and then buried in the ground in such a way as to be barely covered. A fire is next built nearly, but not exactly, on the top of the box, so as to warm the whole. Then the evilly disposed man, beating his head against a tree, names and denounces his enemy. This is done at night or in the early morning and in secret, and is frequently repeated till the enemy dies. The actor must not smile or laugh, and must talk as little as possible till the spell has worked. If a man has reason to suppose that he is being practiced on in this way, he or his friends must endeavor to find the deposit and carefully unearth it. Rough handling of the box may prove immediately fatal. It is then cautiously unwrapped and the contents are thrown into the sea. If the evilly disposed person was discovered, he was in former years immediately killed. If, after making up the little package of relics as above noted, it is put into a frog, the mouth of which is tied up before it is released, a peculiar sickness is produced, which causes the abdomen of the person against whom the sorcery is directed to swell."

Breaking the spell by separating the articles employed to effect it and throwing them into the sea was common to the Tlingit, and probably other tribes on the N. Pacific coast as well. There was a special set of persons among the Kwakiutl whose business was to undo the wizard's work. These went through the same ceremonies as the wizard himself, but ended by putting everything into the fire. This, therefore, was a sort of purification by fire.

Probably the most common method of bewitching was to inject a spearpoint, arrowpoint, piece of bone, or similar object into the body, either by symbolic propulsion or by exerting mental energy. Thus the Ntlakyapamuk shaman shot the nasal bones of the deer into a person by means of his guardian spirits or his thoughts. A shaman might also draw out the soul from a person and send a spirit of a snake or other animal into him that would prevent him from killing animals. Wizards were often supposed to be able to assume the forms of animals themselves, and other remarkable feats were attributed to them.

Taking the North American peoples as a whole, no crime seems to have been more quickly or more severely punished than witchcraft, mere suspicion being often equivalent to conviction and execution, although bloodshed might follow if the victim's family were strong. The Tsimshian suspected of witchcraft was tied up and starved until he confessed, when he was driven into the sea in order to expel the evil spirit. If he refused to confess, he was starved to death or exposed on the beach at low tide until the water rose over him. The Tlingit wizard was starved for some time, but liberated finally if he refused to confess. In the alternative case all that was done was to force him to take the bundle through which he had operated and scatter it in the ocean. Among the Haida witchcraft was supposed to be due to mice which had got inside of a person's body, and if these could be expelled he might be restored to his right mind. There were said to be as many as ten of these mice sometimes, one of which (the last to leave) was a white one. The charge of witchcraft was not only brought against individuals but entire towns and tribes, and in the S. W. the people of the Hopi pueblo of Awatobi were destroyed on this ground. As an illustration of its influence on religious rites it may be stated that the Powamu ceremony of the Hopi was undertaken to relieve the land from the bewitchment of winter. See Oyaron. (J. R. S.)

Withlacoochee (Wi-lak-uchi, 'little Withlako' [Withlako], i. e. 'little great water'). A former Seminole town on Withlacoochee r., probably in Citrus or Sumter co., Fla.

Weecockoogee.—McKenney and Hall, Ind. Tribes, II, 72, 1854.

Withlacoocheetalofa (talófa = 'town'). A former Seminole town between St Marks and Ocklocknee rs., probably in Wakulla co., Fla.

Wethoecuchytalofa.—Bell in Morse, Rep. to Sec. War, 307, 1822. Wi-la-ku-tai talofa.—F. G. Speck, inf'n, 1907 (correct form; tc=ch).

Withlako (wi-lako, 'great water'). A former Seminole village, 4 m. from Clinch's battle ground of Dec. 31, 1835, in N. E. Hernando co., Fla. It was destroyed by the Americans in 1836.

Osceola's Town.—Drake, Ind. Chron., 207, 1836.
Outhloko.—Ibid. Powells town.—Drake, Bk. Inds., bk. iv, 85, 1848.

Witichquaom. A Nanticoke village in 1707, perhaps near Susquehanna r., in s. Pennsylvania.—Evans (1707) quoted by Day, Penn., 391, 1843.

Witukomnom. A division of the Yuki of N. California, living s. of Middle fork of Eel r. in Eden valley and s. to South Eel r. Their dialect differed somewhat from that of the Ukomnom and other divisions of the Yuki proper.

Spanish Yuki.—Powers in Cont. N. A. Ethnol., III, 136, 1877. Witukomnom.—A. L. Kroeber, inf'n, 1905.

Wiwash. That part of the Nanticoke who remained in Maryland when the main body moved northward. In 1792 they numbered perhaps 30 or 40 souls, in a village of 7 houses called Locust Necktown, on Choptank r. in Dorchester co.—Gallatin in Trans. Am. Antiq. Soc., II, 53, 1836.

Wiweakam (Wi'wāgam, 'true frog tribe'). Two Lekwiltok gentes, one belonging to the Wiwekae sept, the other to the Kueha. There seems to be considerable confusion between the people bearing this name and those called Wikae. The population of each is enumerated separately in the Canadian Indian Affairs reports, and in 1909 the number of persons in this division was placed at 77. In 1885 their principal town was called Tatapowis. (J. R. S.)

Weewaikun.—Brit. Col. map, 1872. Weewak.—Ibid. We-wai-ai-kum.—Can. Ind. Aff., 270, 1889. We-wark-kum.—Kane, Wand. in N. A., app., 1859. We-way-a-kum.—Powell in Can. Ind. Brit. Col., 119B, 1884.

Wiwekae (Wi'wēq'aē, 'the Wē'qaēs,' from an ancestor of that name). A sept of the Lekwiltok, living between Bute and Loughborough inlets, Brit. Col. Its gentes, according to Boas, are: Gyigyilkam, Gyeksem, Wiweakam, and a fourth, the name of which is unknown. Their principal town, according to Dawson, is Tsakwalooi, at C. Mudge. Pop. 103 in 1910.

W-wai-ai-kai.—Can. Ind. Aff., 435, 1896 (misprint). Waiwaiakai.—Ibid., pt. 2, 41, 1909. We-wai-ai-kai.—Ibid., 189, 1884. Wē-wark-ka.—Kane, Wand. in N. Wiyahawir (Wi'-ya-ha-wir). A former village of the Kikatsik Shasta on the right bank of Shasta r., below Montague, Siskiyou co., Cal. The name (We-o-how) was incorrectly applied by Steele (Ind. Aff. Rep. 1864, 120, 1865) to all the Shasta occupying the E. side of Shasta r., giving it as their own name. (R. B. D.)

We-o-how.—Steele, op. cit. (said to mean 'stone house,' from the large cave in their country).

Wiyakaotina ('dwellers on the sand'). A band of the Wahpeton Sioux.—Dorsey (after Ashley) in 15th Rep. B. A. E., 216, 1897.

Wiyat. The name given by the Wishosk, a small group of the coast of N. California, to that part of their territory about the lower course of Eel r., and applied by several authors to the Wishosk people dwelling in that section or to the family as a whole. Waiyat is the Karok name for the Wishosk (q. v.).

Vecards.—Powers, MS. quoted by Bancroft, Nat. Races, I, 446, 1874. Viard.—Powers in Cont. N. A. Ethnol., III, 101, 1877. Wee-yot.—Gibbs (1851) in Schoolcraft, Ind. Tribes, III, 434, 1853. We-yot.—Ibid., 133. Wi-yot.—Powers, op. cit., 478.

Wizikute ('Pine Shooter'). The great chief of the Sioux when Hennepin (who referred to him as Ouasicoude) was among them in 1680. His home was at the head of Rum r., Minn. He seems to have been a wise and good man, who protected the French from the cupidity of some of the other chiefs. When Hennepin and Du Luth were about to return to Canada, Wizikute supplied them with an abundance of wild oats, and "with a pencil, he marked down on a sheet of paper, which I had left, the course that we were to keep for 400 leagues together. In short, this natural geographer described our way so exactly that this chart served us as well as any compass could have done, for by observing it punctually we arrived at the place designed without losing our way in the least." (D. R.)

Woapikamikunk ('at the place where there is much white earth.'—Gerard). The largest of 6 Delaware villages in the valley of White r., Ind., probably settled after 1795. Their Indiana lands were sold in 1818.

Wapeminakink.—Brinton, Lenapé Leg., 124, 1885. Woapikamikunk.—Ibid., 124.

Woccon. A small tribe formerly inhabiting E. North Carolina, related linguistically to the Catawba, hence of Siouan stock. All that is known of them is recorded by Lawson, who states that about 1710 they lived 2 leagues from the Tuscarora on the lower Neuse in 2 villages, Yupwauremau and Tootatmeer, having 120 warriors. In his map of 1709, reproduced by Hawks (Hist. No. Car., II, 104, 1859), he places them between Neuse r. and one of its affluents, perhaps about the present Goldsboro, Wayne co. They joined the Tuscarora against the whites in the war of 1711-13, as is learned from incidental references in colonial documents, and it is probable that they were extinguished as a tribe by that war. The remnant may have fled n. with the Tuscarora or have joined the Catawba (Mooney, Siouan Tribes of the East, 65, 1894). Lawson preserved a vocabulary of 150 words of their language, which shows that it was closely related to the Catawba, although the two tribes were separated by nearly 200 miles.

Wacoa.—Morse, Rep. to Sec. War, 145, 1822. Wacoam.—Ibid. Wacon.—Doc. of 1712 in N. C. Col. Rec., I, 891, 1886. Wacon.—Lawson, map of 1709, in Hawks, *Hist. N. Women. One of the most erroneous beliefs relating to the status and condition of the American Indian woman is that she was, both before and after marriage, the abject slave and drudge of the men of her tribe in general. This view, due largely to inaccurate observation and misconception, was correct, perhaps, at times, as to a small percentage of the tribes and peoples whose social organization was of the most elementary kind, politically and ceremonially, and especially of such tribes as were non-agricultural.

Among the other Indian tribes n. of Mexico the status of woman depended on complex conditions having their origin in climate, habitat, mythology, and concepts arising therefrom, and especially in the economic environment and in the character of the social and political organization. It is one of the fundamental deductions of modern mythologic research that the prevailing social, ceremonial, and governmental principles and institutions of a people are closely reflected in the forms, structure, and kind of dominion exercised by the gods of that people. Where numerous goddesses sat on the tribal Olympus, it is safe to say that woman was highly esteemed and exercised some measure of authority. In tribes whose government was based on the clan organization the gods were thought of as related one to another in degrees required by such an institution in which woman is supreme, exercising rights lying at the foundation of tribal society and government. Ethical teaching and observances find their explanation not in the religious views and rites of a people but rather in the rules and principles underlying those institutions which have proved most conducive to the peace, harmony, and prosperity of the community.

In defining the status of woman, a broad distinction must be made between women who are, and women who are not, members of the tribe or community, for among most tribes life, liberty, and the pursuit of well-being are rights belonging only to women who by birth or by the rite of adoption (q. v.) are members or citizens thereof. Other women receive no consideration or respect on account of their sex, although after adoption they were spared, as possible mothers, indiscriminate slaughter in the heat of battle, except while resisting the enemy as valiantly as their brothers and husbands, when they suffered wounds or death for their patriotism.

Among the North American aborigines here dealt with each sex had its own peculiar sphere of duty and responsibility, and it is essential to a proper understanding of the subject that both these spheres of activity should be considered. To protect his family—his wife or wives and their offspring and near kindred—to support them with the products of the chase, to manufacture weapons and wooden utensils, and commonly to provide suitable timbers and bark for the building of the lodge, constituted the duty and obligation which rested on the man. These activities required health, strength, and skill. The warrior was usually absent from his fireside on the chase, on the warpath, or on the fishing trip, weeks, months, and even years, during which he traveled hundreds of miles and was subjected to the hardships and perils of hunting and fighting, and to the inclemency of the weather, often without adequate shelter or food. The labor required in the home and in all that directly affected it fell naturally to the lot of the woman. In addition to the activities which they shared in common with men, and the care of children, women attended to the tanning of skins, the weaving of suitable fibers into fabrics and other articles of necessity, the making of mats and mattresses, baskets, pots of clay, and utensils of bark; sewing, dyeing; gathering and storing of edible roots, seeds, berries, and plants, for future use, and the drying and smoking of meats brought by the hunters. On the march the care of the camp equipage and of the various family belongings constituted part of the woman's duties, in which she was assisted by the children and by such men as were incapacitated for active fighting or hunting. The essential principle governing this division of labor and responsibility between the sexes lies much deeper than apparently heartless tyranny of the man. It is the best possible adjustment of the available means of the family to secure the largest measure of welfare and to protect and perpetuate the little community. No other division was so well adapted to the conditions of life among the North American Indians. Fortified by the doctrine of signatures and by other superstitious reasons and beliefs, custom emphasized by various rites and observances the division of labor between the sexes. Thus, the sowing of seeds by women was supposed to render such seeds more fertile and the earth more productive than if planted by men, for it was held that woman has and controls the faculty of reproduction and increase. Hence sowing and cultivating the crops became one of the exclusive departments of woman's work.

According to Lewis and Clark (Travels, 307, 1806) the Shoshoni husband was the absolute proprietor of his wives and daughters, and might dispose of them by barter or otherwise at his pleasure; and Harmon (Jour. Voy., 344, 1820) declares that the women of the tribes visited by him were treated no better than the dogs. Writing of the Kutchin, and of the Loucheux Indians in particular, Hardesty (Smithson. Rep. 1866, 312, 1867) says that "the women are literally beasts of burden to their lords and masters. All the heavy work is performed by them." A similar statement is made by Powers (Cont. N. A. Ethnol., III, 23, 1877) in regard to the Karok of California. Schoolcraft (Ind. Tribes, v, 167, 1855) declares that the Cree women are subjected to lives of heavy and exacting toil, and that some mothers among them do not hesitate to kill their female infants to save them from the miseries which they themselves have suffered. Champlain, writing in 1615, states that the Huron and Algonquian women were "expected to attend their husbands from place to place in the fields, filling the office of pack-mule in carrying the baggage and in doing a thousand other things." Yet it would seem that this hard life did not thwart their development, for he adds that among these tribes there were a number of powerful women of extraordinary height, who had almost sole care of the lodge and the work at home, tilling the land, planting the corn, gathering a supply of fuel for winter use, beating and spinning the hemp and the bark treatment, they being industrious, frugal, careful, loving, and affectionate."

According to Smith, among the Indians of Virginia, while the men devoted their time and energy to fishing, hunting, warfare, and to other manly exercises out of doors, within the lodge they were often idle, for here the women and children performed the larger share of the work. The women made mats for their own use as well as for trade and exchange, also baskets, mortars, and pestles; planted and gathered the corn and other vegetables; prepared and pounded the corn to obtain meal for their bread, and did all the cooking; cut and brought all the wood used for fuel, and with the help of the children fetched the water used in the lodge. Thus, the women were obliged in performing their duties to bear all kinds of burdens; but they willingly attended to their tasks at their own time and convenience, and were not driven like slaves to do their duty. The descent of blood was traced through the mother. The class of women whom Smith calls "trading girls" affected a peculiar tonsure that differed from that of all other women, to prevent mistakes, as the Indians were as solicitous as Caucasians to keep their wives to themselves.

Lawson (Hist. Car., 1866) says that a woman with a large number of children and with no husband to help support her and them, was assisted by the young men in planting, reaping, and in doing whatever she was incapable of performing herself. He says also that they eulogized a great man by citing the fact that he had "a great many beautiful wives and children, esteemed the greatest blessings amongst these savages." It would thus appear that the North Carolina native woman was not the drudge and slave of her husband or men of her tribe. Concerning people of the same general region, Bartram (Trans. Am. Ethnol. Soc., III, pt. 1, 31, 1853) says that among the Cherokee and the Creeks scarcely a third as many women as men were seen at work in their fields. De Soto found in 1540 a woman whom he styled a queen ruling in royal state a tribe on the Savannah r., indicating that woman at that early period was held in high esteem among these people.

From what has been said it is evident that the authority possessed by the Indian husband over his wife or wives was far from being as absolute as represented by careless observers, and there is certainly no ground for saying that the Indians generally kept their women in a condition of absolute subjection. The available data show that while the married woman, because of her status as such, became a member of her husband's household and owed him certain important duties and obligations, she enjoyed a large measure of independence and was treated with great consideration and deference, and had a marked influence over her husband. Of course, various tribes had different conditions to face and possessed different institutions, and so it happens that in some tribes the wife was the equal of her husband, and in others she was his superior in many things, as among the Iroquois and tribes similarly organized.

In most, if not in all, the highly organized tribes, the woman was the sole master of her own body. Her husband or lover, as the case may be, acquired marital control over her person by her own consent or by that of her family or clan elders. This respect for the person of the native woman was equally shared by captive alien women. Mrs Mary Rowlandson, the wife of a clergyman, and a captive in 1676 for 12 weeks among the fierce Narraganset, bears excellent witness to this fact. She wrote: "I have been in the midst of those roaring lions, and savage bears, that feared neither God, nor man, nor the devil, by day and by night, alone, and in company; sleeping, all sorts together, and not one of them ever offered the least abuse or unchastity to me in word or in action." Roger Williams, with reference to another subject, brings this same respect for woman to view; he wrote: "So did never the Lord Jesus bring any unto his most pure worship, for he abhors, as all men, yea, the very Indians, an unwilling spouse to enter into forced relations" (R. I. Hist. Tract, 1st ser., 14, p. 15). At a later day, and in the face of circumstances adverse to the Indians, Gen. James Clinton, who commanded the New York division in the Sullivan expedition in 1779 against the hostile Iroquois, paid his enemies the tribute of a soldier by writing in April 1779, to Colonel Van Schaick, then leading the troops against the Onondaga, the following terse compliment: "Bad as the savages are, they never violate the chastity of any woman, their prisoners." However, there were cases in various tribes of violation of women, but the guilty men were regarded with horror and aversion. The culprits, if apprehended, were punished by the kindred of the woman, if single, and by her husband and his friends, if married. Among the Sioux and the Yuchi, men who made a practice of seduction were in grave bodily danger from the aggrieved women and girls, and the resort by the latter to extreme measures was sanctioned by public opinion as properly avenging a gross violation of woman's inalienable right—the control of her own body. The dower or bride price, when such was given, did not confer, it seems, on the husband, absolute right over the life and liberty of the wife: it was rather compensation to her kindred and household for the loss of her services. Among the Navaho the husband possesses in reality but very little authority over his wife, although he has obtained her by the payment of a bride price or present (Westermarck, Human Marriage, 392 et seq.)

Among all the tribes of Indians north of Mexico, woman, during the catamenial period, and, among many of the tribes, during the period of gestation and parturition, was regarded as abnormal, extra-human, sacred, in the belief that her condition revealed the functioning of orenda or magic power so potent that if not segregated from the ordinary haunts of men it would disturb the usual course of nature. The proper view point is that while in either condition the woman involuntarily was the seat of processes which marred, if they did not thwart, the normal exercise of human faculties, rather than that she was merely "unclean," and so an object to be tabooed. Yet, it appears that this species of temporary but recurrent taboo did not affect the status of the woman in the social and political organization in any way detrimental to her interests.

It appears also that in many instances woman aspired to excel in some of the vocations which might be regarded as peculiar to the male sex—hunting, fishing, fowling, and fighting beside the man. At times also she was famed, even notorious, as a sorceress. Some of the weirdest tales of sorcery and incantation are connected with the lives and deeds of noted woman sorcerers, who delighted in torture and in destruction of human life.

Some students maintain, on seemingly insufficient grounds, that the institution of maternal descent tends to elevate the social status of woman. Apart from the independence of woman, brought about by purely economic activities arising from the cultivation of the soil, it is doubtful whether woman ever attains any large degree of independence and authority aside from this potent cause. Without a detailed and carefully compiled body of facts concerning the activities and the relations of the sexes, and the relation of each to the various institutions of the community, this question can not be satisfactorily decided. The data concerning the rights of women as compared with those of men to be found in historical accounts of various tribes are so meager and indefinite that it is difficult, if not impossible, to define accurately the effect of either female or male descent on the status of the woman. It is apparent, however, that among the sedentary and agricultural communities the woman enjoyed a large, if not a preponderating, measure of independence and authority, greater or less in proportion to the extent of the community's dependence for daily sustenance on the product of the woman's activities.

Woodchuck. One of the names of the ground-hog (Arctomys monax), called moonack in parts of the S. The present form of the word, as if from "wood" and "chuck," is a corruption by folk-etymology of woodschock, woodshaw, or wejack, a name applied to this animal by the hunters and traders of the Hudson Bay region. The word is derived from the Cree otchek or the Chippewa otchig or odjik, the name of the fisher (Mustela pennanti), this Algonquian term having been transferred by the whites to the ground-hog. In the fur nomenclature of the Hudson's Bay Company the skins of these animals have long been known as woodschocks. (A. F. C.)

Woodchuck day. Candlemas (February 2d), which is so designated from a rural belief that the appearance of the ground-hog on that day presages a return of cold weather and a late spring. (W. R. G.)

Woodwork. Much use is made of wood by the Indians, who, with few exceptions, are skilful workers in that material. Some areas may be classed as favorable for the development of woodworking art, having an abundant supply of straight-grained timber, easily split and worked, and other growths furnishing a variety for all purposes. The richest region is the N. W. coast, where woodworking reached its highest development in historic times. Some densely forested areas, as the Appalachian region, did not seem to foster the art, while in some environments where wood is scarce the Indians have made more extended use of such that is available than tribes better provided with the raw material. Specimens of woodworking survive in ancient deposits of artifacts only where conditions are most favorable, as in the keys of Florida, whose inhabitants worked wood in elaborate designs with shell implements and shark's teeth, or in the dry sands of Arizona, where hard-wood implements, prayersticks of cottonwood, and other objects, have been found.

Fire, the stone ax, and the wedge were the principal tools of the Indian for getting out timber. With these the largest tree could be felled and cut into lengths. Some tribes in the California-Oregon region felled trees by bruising off successive rounds of the wood. Large timber was not demanded, however, except for canoes, house-posts, beams, and totem poles. Boards, when required, were split out with antler wedges, while smaller material was cut with stone or copper tools. The saw, drill, ax, adze, knife, chisel, scraper, rasp, and the smoother, made of suitable stone, shell, copper, or teeth, were used for woodworking, the knife being drawn toward the body. Wood was bent by means of hot water and fire, small rods were straightened with the teeth or with wrenches of bone, horn, or wood, and larger rods or poles in smoke and heat of the fire. In the Pueblo region figurines and other objects of soft wood are modeled entirely by rubbing with coarse sandstone or by attrition upon rock. Canoes were hollowed out with the aid of fire, the charred portions being removed with cutting tools. In every locality each art had its particular tools, varying as to material, hafting, etc., and some arts, as the making of bows and arrows, developed a large number of tools for shaping, finishing, and decorating. Dishes, small boxes, and the like were excavated with great labor by means of scrapers and other cutting tools, as the incisors of the beaver, suitably hafted. The use of curly knots from trees for dishes was widespread, since much of the work in forming the vessel, spoon, or cup had been done by nature. In many cases the interior of the knot had decayed, leaving a shell which became a vessel, with little working. Perforations for lashing, suspending, and fastening were made with the drill. In hard-wood saplings there is often a core of pith which could be pushed out with a cane or grass stem and the hole somewhat enlarged to form a tube. In the Pueblo region roof timbers and the stakes that were used to cover bodies in ancient burials show marks of the stone tools with which they were cut. Firewood was broken from trees by means of large grooved hammers or mauls. Most of the elementary processes known to modern woodworkers were practised by these Indians. Examples of joining, splicing, binding, lashing, pegging, and grooving are found, and in joining birch-bark a process somewhat resembling dovetailing was often employed. The tenon and mortise appear to be absent, their place being taken in Alaskan houses by worked sockets for frame timbers, and in other structures, as the Navaho hogan, by crotched sticks. The N. W. coast tribes had a primitive vise for holding bent-wood boxes and dishes. Pegs of bone, ivory, or wood were used instead of nails.

Among the numerous products of woodworking may be mentioned bows, arrows, spears, armor, gaming blocks, trinket boxes, and chests, especially developed by the N. W. coast tribes, boat frames, boats, sleds, bowls, mortars, pestles, fire-drills, pipestems, masks, and figurines. Among these objects are specimens carved with such skill as to entitle them to a place in the class of art productions.

Wopohwats (Wo'poh'wits, 'White Shield Owner,' commonly known to the whites as White Shield). A former chief of the Southern Cheyenne, born about 1833 on an upper branch of North Platte r., Wyo.; died in 1883 near the present Kingfisher, Okla. In accordance with Indian custom, he had different names at different periods. As a young man he was known as Mouse Road. His more famous name was bestowed on him in 1862 by his uncle, the noted Black Kettle, killed in the battle of the Washita, who had previously borne the name himself. About the year 1878 he assumed his grandfather's name of Buffalo Beard, which he kept until his death. Having distinguished himself as a warrior, particularly in two engagements with the Pawnee, he became a leader in the Bow-string soldier society, and in 1870 was formally elected to the council of chiefs. In the next year he was one of a delegation sent to Washington to represent the allied Cheyenne and Arapaho tribes then newly established on a reservation in Oklahoma, and with his companions received from President Grant a treaty medal bearing the device of a pipe, a plow, a globe, and a Bible, which were explained to symbolize peace, agriculture, education, and Christianity. White Shield accepted all this literally, and on his return became an earnest advocate of civilization, schools, and mission work. Throughout the outbreak of 1874-75 he held his band quiet at the agency. In 1881 he was again chosen as delegate, but was unable to go by reason of the death of his daughter, tribal custom forbidding participation in public business by anyone in mourning. As was common with the Plains Indians, he had two wives, who were sisters. His son, Harvey White Shield (see Hishkowits), is one of the best educated young men in the tribe and an efficient mission helper and interpreter. (J. M.)

His father, Tavibo, 'White Man,' was also a reputed medicine-man, and the son may have inherited the mystic tendency from him. After his father's death the boy was taken into the family of a white rancher from whom he received the name of Jack Wilson, by which he was commonly known among the whites. He was still alive in 1905, but had lost in large measure his former influence. For an account of his supernatural mission, see Ghost dance. Consult Mooney, Ghost Dance Religion, 14th Rep. B. A. Wright, Allen. A Choctaw preacher, born in Mississippi about 1825; he emigrated with most of the tribe to Indian Ter. in 1832, his parents dying soon afterward, leaving him and a sister. He had a strain of white blood, probably one-eighth or one-sixteenth. In his youth he lived some time in the family of the Rev. Cyrus Kingsbury, a Presbyterian missionary, and began his education in a missionary day-school near Doaksville. While here he was converted to the Christian faith, and soon after entered Spencer Academy in the Choctaw Nation. By reason of his studious habits he was sent by the Choctaw authorities to a school in Delaware, but afterward went to Union College, Schenectady, N. Y., where he was graduated in 1852. He then took a full course in Union Theological Seminary, New York City, being graduated in 1855, and in the following year was ordained by the Indian Presbytery. Returning to his people in Indian Ter., he preached to them until his death in 1885. His people appreciating his ability and uprightness, Mr Wright was called to affairs of state, being elected successively a member of the Choctaw House of Representatives and the Senate, and afterward Treasurer. In 1866, after the Civil War, he was sent to Washington as a delegate to negotiate a new treaty with the United States, and during his absence was elected principal chief of the Choctaw Nation, an office which he held until Wyalusing (M'chwihillusink, 'at the dwelling place of the hoary veteran,' so called from an ancient warrior who lived near.—Heckewelder). A former Munsee and Iroquois settlement at the site of the present town of the same name in Bradford co., Pa. It was also the site of an older Indian village, called Gohontoto, which is mentioned by Cammerhoff, who visited the place in 1750. "Here, they tell me," he says, "was in early times an Indian town, traces of which are still noticeable, e. g., corn-pits, etc., inhabited by a distinct nation (neither Aquinoschioni, i. e., Iriquois, nor Delawares), who spoke a peculiar language and were called Tehotitachsae; against these the Five Nations warred, and rooted them out. The Cayugas for a time held a number of them, but the Nation and their language are now exterminated and extinct" (Cammerhoff quoted by Clark in Jour. Mil. Exped. Gen. Sullivan, 124, 1887). In 1752 Papunhank, a Munsee chief, settled at the site with 20 families. He was a frequent visitor to Philadelphia, where he came in contact with the Quakers, and later made great pretensions as a religious teacher. The people of his village became dissatisfied with his instruction, and after a conference decided to take the first religious teacher who came to their village, having been undecided whether they wanted a Quaker or a Moravian. John Woolman, a Quaker evangelist, who had become acquainted with Papunhank during his visits to Philadelphia, set out for Wyalusing in May, 1763, accompanied by Benjamin Parvin. News of the situation reaching David Zeisberger at Bethlehem, he at once started for this promising field, passing Woolman on the mountains below Wilkes-Barré. On the way he met Job Chillaway, a Delaware, the messenger and friend of the English, who was then living in Papunhank's village. Together they entered the settlement and were welcomed by the Indians. In a few days Woolman reached the place; he was informed of the decision of the council, and that as a consequence they had accepted Zeisberger as their teacher. The latter remained until the outbreak of hostilities during the conspiracy of Pontiac, when he removed the Moravian Indians to Bethlehem, thence to Philadelphia (Arch. Pa., iv, 138, 1853). At the urgent invitation of Papunhank, these Indians moved back to Wyalusing, which they reached May 18, 1765. Owing to various causes the mission was abandoned, June 11, 1772, by the Moravians, who removed to Beaver r. (see Friedenshuetten). During the Revolution the village became a gathering place for hostile Indians and Tories, many of the raids into the Susquehanna valley being planned here and at Sheshequin. On Sept. 28, 1778, Col. Hartley marched from Sheshequin, which he had destroyed, and camped that night at Wyalusing, which the Indians had deserted just before his arrival. On the 29th his detachment of about 120 was attacked by the Indians a short distance from the village; the Indians were defeated, leaving 10 dead, while Hartley had 4 killed and 10 wounded. From here he marched to Wyoming (Arch. Pa., vii, 5-9, 1853). On Aug. 5-7, 1779, Sullivan's army encamped at the site of the Indian village when on its expedition to the Seneca country. Rev. Mr Rogers, chaplain in this expedition, says in his journal, "No sign of even the smallest hut was left standing" (Jour. Mil. Exped. Gen. Sullivan, 258, 1887). (G. P. D.)

Wyandotte. An American breed of fowls, earlier known as Sebright Cochins, said to have sprung from the mating of a Sebright bantam cock and a Cochin hen. The name was proposed at Worcester, Mass., in 1883, by Mr Houdette, and after some opposition it has been accepted as the name of the fowl (T. F. McGrew, U. S. Dept. of Agr. Bull. 31, 1901). The word is the same as Wyandot, the name of one of the peoples of Iroquoian stock. (A. F. C.)

Wyoming (Delaware: M'cheuwómink, 'upon the great plain.' The native name, variously corrupted to Chiwaumuc, Wiawamic, Wayomic, Waiomink, etc., finally reached the more euphonious form of Wyoming, a word which was long supposed to signify 'field of blood.' The name was made widely known by the poet Campbell in his "Gertrude of Wyoming" (1809), an imaginary tale the scenes and incidents of which are connected with the massacre of the settlers on July 3, 1778, by British soldiers, Tories, and Indians in the above-named picturesque valley. It is not known who suggested the name of the state (which had been proposed as that of a territory as early as 1865), but it was probably some emigrant or emigrants from one of the dozen or more places so called in the different parts of the Union.—Gerard). A settlement, before 1744, of Shawnee and Mahican, after which time and until 1756 it was made up of Shawnee, Mahican, Iroquois, Munsee, and Nanticoke. After the latter date it was a Delaware and Munsee village, the headquarters of Tedyuskung, the leading chief of the Delawares. The principal settlement was at the site of the present Wilkes-Barré, Luzerne co., Pa. The name was applied to the lands in the Wyoming valley, in which there were a number of Indian villages, and then to the chief town of the region. The location is first mentioned in the records of Pennsylvania, at the council of Philadelphia, June, 1728. At the council at Conestoga (May 1728), Tawenna, chief of the Conestoga, said that the attack upon John Burt's house the year before had not been made by the Conestoga, Delawares, Shawnee, or Conoy, but by the Minisink (Col. Rec. Pa., iv, 314, 1851). At the council at Philadelphia in June following, Allumapees stated that the "Mensy-sineks" lived "at the Forks of Sasquehannah above Meehayomy, & that their Kings name is Kindarsowa" (ibid., III, 326, 1852). When the Delaware chiefs signed the famous deed of 1737 (the so-called "Walking Purchase"), they did so with the understanding that those living in the Minisinks would not be obliged to abandon their lands, but would live there in friendship with the English (Walton, Conrad Weiser, 66, 1900; Arch. Pa., I, 541, 1852). At the council at Philadelphia in 1742, when Canassatego ordered the Delawares to leave at once for Shamokin or Wyoming, he was in ignorance of any such understanding on the part of the Delawares. Weiser, if he had nothing to do with this speech, at least permitted its statements to pass unrebuked. The Delawares went away from this council thoroughly humiliated. Some of them moved to Shamokin, some to Wyoming, but the great majority of them went w. to the Ohio and joined the Shawnee in their effort to throw off the Iroquois yoke. When Zinzendorf and his party of Moravian missionaries visited Wyoming in the fall of 1742, he found it occupied chiefly by the Shawnee, who were in no mood to listen to him, as they feared that he had come to buy their lands (Zinzendorf's Jour. in Mem. Moravian Church, 71, 1870). At this time the flats w. of the Susquehanna were occupied by the Shawnee, while the Mahican had a large village at the n. end of the valley, on the same side of the river. In 1751 the Nanticoke had a settlement at the lower end of the valley on the e. side of the river. At the treaty of Albany, in 1754, when the Iroquois disposed of the lands drained by the Juniata, they reserved these lands at Wyoming as a hunting ground, and as a place of refuge from the French, should they be driven to seek an asylum (Col. Rec. Pa., vi, 119, 1851). They then appointed John Shikellimy, son of Shikellimy, to look after these lands for them. At the council at Easton, 1757, Tedyuskung said: "We intend to settle at Wyoming, and we want to have certain boundaries fixed between you and us, and a certain tract of land fixed, which it shall not be lawful for us or our children ever to sell, or for you or any of your children ever to buy" (ibid., vii, 678, 1851). When it was discovered that this land had been sold by the Mohawk at Albany in 1754 to Lydius, the agent of the Connecticut Company, Conrad Weiser declared that the deed was fraudulent and that unless the settlement was prevented an Indian war would result. Hendrick, the Mohawk chief, summoned to Philadelphia, stated that the deed had been obtained by fraud. The extended discussion between Pennsylvania and Connecticut and the fearful slaughter at Wyoming were the results of this transaction. (For details relating to this subject, consult Arch. Pa., II, 120 et seq., 1852; Walton, Conrad Weiser, 193 et seq., 1900.) In 1755 the Mohawk refused to accept the second instalment of the money for the purchase of the lands, although Hendrick had advised them to do so. In July of that year came Braddock's defeat, and then all the discontented Indians sought vengeance for the many grievances they had against Pennsylvania. In 1756 Wyoming was occupied by a mixed population of Delawares, Shawnee, Iroquois, and Mahican, with a few Chickasaw, the Delawares being in the majority. In the early summer of that year Tedyuskung moved to Tioga with his followers. After the council of 1757 the authorities of Pennsylvania offered to enact a law which would grant the Wyoming lands to Tedyuskung and the Delawares forever, but the project was delayed for various reasons, chiefly because the lands had never been bought from the Iroquois. Tedyuskung insisted that a fort and houses be built at Wyoming for the Delawares, and Weiser was asked to look after this work, but declined to do so on account of his health and because he feared the Iroquois would blame him for doing the work. The council then appointed one of their own number to oversee the work; a force of 50 or 60 carpenters and masons was sent to Wyoming, where 10 wooden houses with stone foundations were erected. In the spring of 1758 Tedyuskung went to Philadelphia from Wyoming, to which place he had removed, and asked that schoolmasters, counsellors, and two ministers be sent to his village, saying, "You must consider that I have a soul as well as another" (Col. Rec. Pa., viii, 47, 1852). At the treaty at Easton, 1758, he again presented the matter of the fraudulent "Walking Purchase," and charged the Mohawk with selling the lands at Wyoming, which had been promised to the Delawares as a permanent home. The old chief had at last to pay with his life the penalty for what he said at this council. In June, 1758, Charles Thomson and Frederick Post started on their journey to Wyoming, but when they reached a point about 15 m. from their destination they were warned by Tedyuskung, who met them, to advance no farther as the woods about Wyoming were filled with hostile Indians (Jour. Thomson and Post in Arch. Pa., iii, 412-422, 1853). In the spring of 1763 a number of families from Connecticut settled at Wyoming (Arch. Pa., iv, 105, 1853). This led to an attack by the Indians in which 20 of the settlers were killed (ibid., 127). No more attempts were made to settle there until 1769, when another company of Connecticut immigrants reached the place, and at once commenced the erection of a fort, called Ft Durkee, situated between Ross and South sts., Wilkes-Barré (Frontier Forts of Pa., i, 425, 1896). Other forts were built in this region about this same time: Ft Wyoming (1771), erected by the Pennsylvania authorities for the reduction of Ft Durkee, was situated at the junction of Northampton and River sts., Wilkes-Barré; Mill Creek Fort (1772) on the n. side of the creek of the same name; Forty Fort, in the borough of the same name, built in 1770 by the 40 pioneers of the Connecticut Co. who went to the region in 1769. During the hostilities, which became more threatening in 1778, Forty Fort became the place of refuge to which many of the settlers went. In June of that year, when it was known that the large force of the enemy were approaching Wyoming, under Maj. John Butler, the inhabitants sought refuge in the various forts in the region, but on account of its strength and size the majority gathered in Forty Fort. Butler's force of about 1,100 men, consisting of about 200 British, the same number of Tories, and about 700 Indians, chiefly Seneca and Cayuga, descended the Susquehanna and landed a few miles above Wyoming, whence they marched on the night of July 1 and encamped on the mountain at the head of the valley. The next day demand was made for the surrender of the fort, which was refused. The force gathered in the fort numbered fewer than 400 (chiefly old men and boys, unfitted by reason of their age to be at the front with the American army), commanded by Col. Zebulon Butler. The members of the garrison, no doubt mistaken in their estimates of the number of the enemy, marched out on July 3 to attack them. Then followed the battle, the defeat, the flight, and the awful massacre (Frontier Forts of Pa., i, 438 et seq., 1896; Parkman, Conspiracy of Pontiac, ii, 109, 1901 (first massacre 1763); Arch. Pa., vi, 626, 629, 631 et seq., 1853; Egle, Hist. Pa., 898-906, 1883). During the fall and winter of 1778 the entire frontier from Wyoming to Ft Pitt was subject to the raids of the Seneca and Cayuga. Washington decided to send an expedition, under Maj.-Gen. John Sullivan, into the Seneca and Cayuga country to destroy the villages and drive the Indians back to the British lines. Sullivan's army reached Wyoming on June 14, where it remained until July 31, awaiting supplies. At that time the village was filled with the widows and orphans of those who had been slain in the massacre of the year previous.

Xarame (probably pronounced cha-rá'-me). A Coahuiltecan tribe, well known in the 18th century at several Franciscan missions. They seem to have been natives of the region of San Antonio, Tex. In 1699 they were in Coahuila at both San Juan Bautista and San Francisco Solano, below the present Eagle Pass, on the Rio Grande (Portillo, Apuntes, 271, 279, 1888). Soon after this date they were the chief tribe at the latter mission, a Xarame being its "governor" (Paredes, Visita, 1729, par. 7, MS.). Of the 144 Indians baptized there in 1704, 22 were Xarames (Bap. Rec., MS.). When, in 1718, Father Olivares transferred this mission to San Antonio r., Texas, and reestablished it as that of San Antonio de Valero, he took with him the Xarame neophytes to serve as teachers and examples for the Payaya and other new tribes to be gathered (Olivares, Carta, in Mem. de Nueva España, XXVII, 169, MS.). The first baptism at San Antonio de Valero was that of a Xarame child, and the tribe was still represented at that mission late in the 18th century. (H. E. B.) are given in the same document as one of the tribes living n. of the mission, the two names probably applied to the same tribe, the Ervipame (Fr. Isidro Felix de Espinosa, "Relacion Compendiosa" of the Rio Grande missions, MS. in the archives of the College of Santa Cruz de Querétaro). (H. E. B.)

Xiabu. A village, probably Coahuiltecan, encountered in Coahuila in 1689 by De León (Derrotero, MS.), 5 leagues s. of the Rio Grande, when on his way to Texas.

Xinesi (probably pronounced chē-nā'-sē). The high-priest of the Hasinai confederacy of E. Texas. The bonds of this confederacy, which included about a dozen tribes, seem to have been rather more religious than political. The Hainai was regarded as the head tribe, and what gave it its prestige was the location on its western border, near Angelina r., of the chief temple containing the sacred fire, from which directly or indirectly all the household fires were kindled. For religious purposes there was first a sub-grouping of the confederacy. Thus, for ordinary occasions, the Neche and Hainai tribes held their ceremonies and festivals together, while the Nacogdoche and Nasoni formed another group. But many of their religious and social functions included the whole confederacy. Such were held at the chief fire temple. Presiding over this temple was the head priest called the xinesi, or chenesi. According to Espinosa, chenesi seems to have been a general term meaning priest, yet even he ordinarily restricted the name to this head priest. Terán, Jesus María, and Massanet agree in regarding the xinesi as the highest individual authority in the group, but they do not give the same view as to the nature of his position. Massanet regarded him as a high priest; Espinosa regarded him mainly in this light, but testified that his authority was superior to that of any chief; Jesus María calls him not only a priest, but also a "little king," and tells of his great authority as a ruler. The details given as to his functions, however, indicate that he was primarily a priest, but that through his personal dignity and priestly influence he outranked all others, and that his word had great authority in civil as well as in religious affairs.

The xinesi lived, as has been indicated, in the center of the confederacy, near Angelina r., w. of Nacogdoches. According to Jesus María, his office was hereditary, and the inference from all circumstances is that it was attached to the Hainai tribe. The most important duty of the xinesi was to care for the fire temple near his house, and to consult the Coninisi, or fictitious twin boys, by means of which he talked with the Great Chief Above. The early writers convey the impression that the xinesi was a person of great dignity, doing no manual labor, and commanding great personal respect. He was fed and clothed, we are told, by community gifts, to insure which he sometimes preyed upon the superstition of his people. At the house of each cuddi, or civil chief, and of each of the other dignitaries, a special seat of honor and a bed were scrupulously reserved for the use of the xinesi during his visits. Xoxi. Mentioned by Oviedo (Hist. Gen. Indies, III, 628, 1853) as one of the provinces or villages visited by Ayllon, probably on the South Carolina coast, in 1520.

Xuacaya. A province or tribe on the Carolina coast, visited by Ayllon in 1521.—Barcia, Ensayo, 5, 1723.

Ca-wa'.—Henshaw, Buenaventura MS. vocab., B. A. E., 1884 (c-sh). Xugua.—Cabrillo, Narr. (1542), in Smith, Colec. Doc. Fla., 181, 1857. Xuqua.—Taylor in Cal. Farmer, Apr. 17, 1863.

Xumis. A former village connected with San Carlos mission, Cal., and said to have belonged to the Esselen.—Taylor in Cal. Farmer, Apr. 20, 1860.

Xumskhumesilis (Xúmsxumesilis). An ancestor of a Quatsino gens after whom the gens was sometimes named.—Boas in Petermanns Mitteil., pt. 5, 131, 1887.

Xutis. Mentioned by Oñate (Doc. Inéd., xvi, 103, 1871) as a pueblo of New Mexico in 1598. Unidentified.

Yaaga (Ya'-aga, 'little willows'). A former large village that formed the center of the Klamath settlements on Williamson r., about a mile from Upper Klamath lake, Oreg., where the Linkville-Ft. Klamath road crosses the stream.—Gatschet in Cont. N. A. Ethnol., II, pt. I, xxix, 1890.

Yaaihakemae (Yaai'x'agemaē, 'the crabs'). A gens of the Komoyue, a sept of the true Kwakiutl, and a clan of the Tenaktak.

Yaai'Hak'emaē.—Boas in 6th Rep. N. W. Tribes Can., 54, 1890. Yaai'x'agemaē.—Boas in Rep. U. S. Nat. Mus. 1895, 330, 1897. Yix'agemaē.—Boas in Petermanns Mitteil., pt. 5, 131, 1887.

Yaasitun (Ya'-a-si'-tūn). A Takelma band or village on the s. side of Rogue r., Oreg.—Dorsey in Jour. Am. Folk-lore, III, 235, 1890.

Yaclossa. A former small tribe represented at San Antonio de Valero mission, Texas.

Yacherk. A Nushagagmiut Eskimo village on Igushik r., Alaska.

Yachérgamut.—Spurr quoted by Baker, Geog. Dict. Alaska, 1902 (mut=miut, 'people'). Yacherk.—Baker, ibid.

Yachikamni. Mentioned by Pinart as the tribe that originally lived on the site of the present city of Stockton, Cal., and hence belonged to the Cholovone tribe of the Mariposan (Yokuts) family. The same is said by Taylor of the Yachimese, the tribes being apparently identical.

Yachin ('mesquite'). An Apache band or clan at San Carlos agency and Ft Apache, Ariz., in 1881.

Ya-chin.—Bourke in Jour. Am. Folk-lore, III, 112, 1890.

Yacomanshaghking (apparently a corruption of Yagawanshaking, 'at the place of small huts.'—Gerard). A Delaware tribe or band that dwelt on the E. bank of Delaware r. in New Jersey, on a small stream about the present Camden.—Herrman, map (1670), in Rep. on Line between Va. and Md., 1873.

Yacomui. A village, presumably Costanoan, formerly connected with Dolores mission, San Francisco, Cal.

Yacomui.—Taylor in Cal. Farmer, Oct. 18, 1861. Yacumi.—Ibid.

Yacum. A warlike Diegueño band, in alliance with the Cocopa, occupying a valley in the mountains between the desert and the Gulf coast, chiefly in Lower California. They were said to number fewer than 200 in 1853. They raised corn, melons, pumpkins, beans, and other crops, by irrigation.

Guaicamaopa.—Kino (ca. 1699) in Doc. Hist. Mex., 4th s., I, 349, 1856 (located by Kino at junction of the Gila and the Colorado, but probably the identical tribe; opa is a Pima word signifying 'people'). Ha-coom.—Heintzelman (1853) in H. R. Ex. Doc. 76, 34th Cong., 3d sess., 34-53, 1857. Jacum.—Ibid. Yacum.—Ibid.

Yadus (Yä'das). An important subdivision of the Stustas, a great Haida family of the Eagle clan. It constituted one of the Kaigani families, and was subdivided like them (in the Tlingit style) into 5 house-groups: Ildjunai-hadai, Nalgus-hadai, Nakons-hadai, Otkialnaas-hadai, and Otnaas-hadai.—Swanton, Cont. Haida, 276, 1905.

Yagats (Ya'-gats). A Paiute band formerly at Amargoza, s. e. Cal.—Powell in Ind. Aff. Rep. 1873, 51, 1874.

Yagenechito (Choctaw: 'large land'). A tribe, probably affiliated with the Chitimacha, located on De l'Isle's map (1703) on Bayou Lafourche, La.

Yagenesito.—Iberville (1699) in Margry, Déc., IV, 172, 1880. Yagenechito.—Ibid., 184. Yagnetnito.—De l'Isle, map, 1703. Yaguenechitons.—La Harpe (1706) in French, Hist. Coll. La., III, 35, 1861. Yaguenechito.—Iberville, op. cit., 155.

Yagnashoogawa (possibly for Yakniachukma, 'good country'). A former Choctaw town, noted by Romans in 1775 and perhaps identifiable with a traditional town on Indian branch of Running Tiger cr., Kemper co., Miss.—Halbert in Pub. Miss. Hist. Soc., VI, 425, 1902.

Yagua. A Calusa village on the s. w. coast of Florida, about 1570.—Fontaneda Mem. (ca. 1575), Smith trans., 19, 1854.

Yä'gan.—Swanton, Cont. Haida, 281, 1905.

Yagunkun-Inagai (Yä'gun-kun-Inagä'-i, 'Yagun river point-town people'). A branch of the Kuna-lanas, a great Haida family belonging to the Raven clan. The Yagun is the largest stream on the Queen Charlotte ids. (J. R. S.)

Yägun kunInagai'.—Boas, 12th Rep. N. W. Tribes Can., 23, 1898. Yä'gun kun Inagä'-i.—Swanton, Cont. Haida, 271, 1905.

Yagunstlan-Inagai (Yä'gun sL'an Inagä'-i, 'Yagun river rear-town people'). A local subdivision of the Stlengalanas, a Haida family belonging to the Raven clan.—Swanton, Cont. Haida, 271, 1905.

Yahach. A former Alsea village on the Pacific coast s. of the mouth of the Alsea r., Oreg.

Yahato.—Dorsey in Jour. Am. Folk-lore, III, 230, 1890. Yahata.—Ibid. Yä'-qai-yük.—Ibid. Yawhick.—Ind. Aff. Rep., 107, 1856. Yawhuch.—Ibid., 80, 1863. Youitta.—Lewis and Clark Exped., II, 118, 1814. Youitz.—Drake, Bk. Inda., xi, 1848.

Yahal. A Yaquina village on the n. side of Yaquina r., Oreg.

Yä'-häl.—Dorsey in Jour. Am. Folk-lore, III, 229, 1890.

Yahalgi ('wolf people'). A clan of the Creeks.

Yä'-hä.—Morgan, Anc. Soc., 161, 1878. Yahalgi.—Gatschet, Creek Migr. Leg., I, 155, 1884 (algi= 'people').

Yahandika (Yähandika, 'ground-hog eaters'). Given by Hoffman (Proc. Am. Philos. Soc., XXIII, 298, 1886) as one of the former divisions of the Shoshoni.

Kelsemaht, on Flores id., Clayoquot sd., w. coast of Vancouver id., with 76 inhabitants in 1909.

Yahuskin. A Shoshonean band which prior to 1864 roved and hunted with the Walpapi about the shores of Goose, Silver, Warner, and Harney lakes, Oreg., and temporarily in Surprise valley and Klamath marsh, where they gathered wokus for food. They came specially into notice in 1864, on Oct. 14 of which year they became party to the treaty of Klamath lake by which their territory was ceded to the United States and they were placed on Klamath res., established at that time. With the Walpapi and a few Paiute who had joined them, the Yahuskin were assigned lands in the southern part of the reservation, on Sprague r. about Yainax, where they have since resided, although through intermarriage with other Indians on the reservation their tribal identity became lost by 1888, since which time they have been officially designated as Paiute. Gatschet, who visited them about 1884, says they were then engaged in agriculture, lived in willow lodges and log houses, and were gradually abandoning their roaming proclivities. The Yahuskin have always been officially enumerated with the Walpapi, the aggregate population varying between 1877 and 1891 from 135 to 166 persons. In 1909 they were reported at 103.

Yahoskins.—Applegate in Ind. Aff. Rep., 90, 1886.
Yahosshkin.—Gatschet in Cont. N. A. Ethnol., II, pt. 1, xxxv, 1890. Yahosshkin.—Treaty of 1864 in Ind. Laws and Treaties, II, 663, 1903. Yahosshkin Snakes.—H. R. Rep. 98, 42d Cong., 3d sess., 449, 1873. Yahuskin.—Meacham in Ind. Aff. Rep., 62, 1870.

Yaka. The Corn clans of the Keresan pueblos at Laguna, Acoma, Santa Ana, Sia, San Felipe, and Cochiti, N. Mex. The Corn clans of Acoma (Kochinish, Yellow; Kukanish, Red; Kuishkosh, Blue; Kuishtiti, Brown; and Kuesh, White) formed a phratry, as do the Yellow and Red Corn clans of Laguna, who claim to have come originally from Acoma. The Blue, Brown, and White Corn clans of Acoma are now extinct. The varying forms of the clan name among the different Keresan villages are: Laguna, Yaka-hánoch; Acoma, Yaka-hánoch; Santa Ana, Yak'-háno; Sia and San Felipe, Yaka-háno; Cochiti, Yak'-hánuh. The termination háno, etc., signifies 'people.'—Hodge in Am. Anthr., IX, 349, 1896.

Yá-ka.—Stevenson in 11th Rep. B. A. E., 19, 1894.
Yakka.—Bandeller, Delight Makers, 257, 1890.

Yakchilak. A Kuskwogmiut Eskimo village near the mouth of Kuskokwim r., Alaska.

Yachtahilágamiut.—Spurr and Post quoted by Baker, Geog. Dict. Alaska, 1902. Yakchilak.—Baker, ibid.

Yakima (Ya-ki-má, 'runaway'). An important Shahaptian tribe, formerly living on both sides of the Columbia and on the northerly branches of the Yakima (formerly Taptal) and the Wenatchee, in Washington. They are mentioned by Lewis and Clark in 1806 under the name Cutsahnim (possibly the name of a chief) and estimated as 1,200 in number, but there is no certainty as to the bands included under that figure. In 1855 the United States made a treaty with the Yakima and 13 other tribes of Shahaptian, Salishan, and Chinookan stocks, by which they ceded the territory from the Cascade mts. to Palouse and Snake rs. and from L. Chelan to the Columbia, and the Yakima res. was established, upon which all the participating tribes and bands were to be confederated as the Yakima nation under the leadership of Kamaiakan (q. v.), a distinguished Yakima chief. Before this treaty could be ratified the Yakima war broke out, and it was not until 1859 that the provisions of the treaty were carried into effect. The Palos and certain other tribes have never recognized the treaty or come on the reservation. Since the establishment of the reservation the term Yakima has been generally used in a comprehensive sense to include all the tribes within its limits, so that it is now impossible to estimate the number of Yakima proper. The total Indian population of the reservation was officially estimated at 1,900 in 1909, but of this number probably comparatively few are true

Yakima. The native name of the Yakima is Waptailmim, 'people of the narrow river,' or Pa'kiut'lëma, 'people of the gap,' both names referring to the narrows in Yakima r. at Union Gap, where their chief village was formerly situated. Other bands were the Setaslema, of Setass cr., and the Pisko, of the lower Yakima. Little is known of the particular customs of the Yakima, but there is no reason to suppose that their life differed greatly from that of the Nez Percés (q. v.) and other Shahaptian peoples. Consult Mooney in 14th Rep. B. A. E., pt. 2, 1896. (J. M.)

Yakonan Family. A linguistic family formerly occupying a territory in w. Oregon, on and adjacent to the coast from Yaquina r. s. to Umpqua r. The family was probably never strong in numbers and of late years has decreased rapidly. The few survivors are on the Siletz res., in Oregon. The family is of considerable ethnologic interest, since it apparently represents the southern limit of a type of culture exhibited particularly by the Chinookan, Salishan, and other tribes of the coast of Washington and Vancouver id. The Athapascan tribes of s. Oregon and n. California seem to have been more deeply affected by contact with Californian stocks.

The Yakonan conformed physically to the general type of the N. W. coast and are notable as marking the southern limit in that region of the practice of artificial deformation of the head. Their social organization is not fully understood, but there was no totemic clan system, though a tendency to local segregation of groups related by blood was evident in their villages. There was also a preference for marriage outside the tribe, though this did not have the force of an exogamous rule, so far as can be learned. The social orders of nobility and common people, peculiar to the N. W. coast, obtained, and slavery was an institution in full force until the tribes came under the control of the United States. The Yakonan mythology and traditions are distinctly of the type of the coast tribes of Washington, but they show traces of modification by contact with the Californian stocks on the s. The family was composed of 4 tribes occupying adjacent districts, which, from n. to s., were: Yaquina, Alsea, Siuslaw, and Kuitsh. These tribes have played an unimportant rôle in history and little is known of them. On the formation of the Siletz res. in 1855 they were removed thither, and since that time they have declined so rapidly in numbers, principally through the ravages of tuberculosis, that they are now on the verge of extinction. Yaku (Yak'u). A Haida town of the Dostlan-Inagai family, that formerly stood on the n. w. coast of Graham id., opposite North id., Queen Charlotte ids., Brit. Col. This town, or it and the neighboring one of Kiusta together, may be that designated Lu-lan-na by John Work, 1836-41, to which he assigned 20 houses and 296 people. Old people remember 4 large houses and 4 small ones in Yaku, and 9 houses in Kiusta. This would seem to indicate a population in Yaku proper of about 100 to 120. (J. R. S.)

Ik'k'o.—Boas, 12th Rep. N. W. Tribes Can., 22, 1898. Kakoh.—Dawson, Q. Charlotte Ids., 162a,

Yaku-gitinai (Yā'ku gītīnā'-i, 'the middle (giti'ns)'). A subdivision of the Hlgahet-gitinai, a Haida family of the Eagle clan. They received their name from having lived in the middle of Skidegate village; there they killed a chief and fled to the w. coast. —Swanton, Cont. Haida, 274, 1905.

Yaku-lanas (Yā'ku lā'nas, 'middle-town people'). A large and important Haida family belonging to the Raven clan. By the Skidegate people it is said they were so named because they occupied the middle row in a legendary five-row town, where all the Raven side formerly lived (see Skenā). The Masset people attributed it to the fact that wherever the members of this family settled they occupied the middle of the village. They are said to have come originally from the s. end of Queen Charlotte id., but the greater part finally moved to Alaska, where they constituted the most important Raven family among the Kaigani. One subdivision, the Aoyaku-lanai, settled in Masset inlet. Of the Kaigani part of the family there were 4 subdivisions, the Kaad-naas-hadai, Yehl-naas-hadai, Skistlai-nai-hadai, and Nakaduts-hadai. The extinct Ta-ahl-lanas of North id. perhaps belonged to it. Before they left Queen Charlotte id. their principal town was Dadens. In Alaska it was Klinkwan. The Hlgahet-gu-lanas are said to have once been a part of this family. —Swanton, Cont. Haida, 271, 1905. Yak' lā'nas.—Bosw, 12th Rep. N. W. Tribes Can., 22, 1898. Yakwū Lannas.—Harriman in Proc. Roy. Soc. Can., sec. II, 125, 1903.

Yakutat. A Tlingit tribe centering around the bay of the same name, but extending northward to Copper r. and southward to Dry bay, Alaska. Pop. 826 in 1880, 436 in 1890. Their principal winter town is Yakutat. According to a contributor to The Alaskan, the town on Dry bay is called Satah. Emmons considers the Dry bay and Chilkat (Controller bay) Indians as distinct divisions. A summer village near Copper r. is named Chilkat, and Gonaho, Gutheni, and Hlahayik are the names of former towns. Social divisions are Ganahadi, Kashkekoan, Koskedi, and Tekoedi. (J. R. S.)

Yakutat. The principal town of the Yakutat tribe on the bay of the same name in Alaska. Pop. 300 in 1890. Yāk-dā't.—Swanton, field notes, B. A. E., 1904.

YAKUTAT PRIEST

Yakwal ('drifted ones,' from yākuwānā, 'I am carried off by water'). A tribe traditionally found by the Tonkawa on the Gulf coast near Galveston, Texas. They recognized the Yakwal language as a dialect of their own and believed that the separation had been caused by a flood. See Yujuane. (A. S. G.)

Yalacasooche. A former Seminole town at the mouth of Ocklawaha r., Putnam co., Fla.—H. R. Ex. Doc. 74 (1823), 19th Cong., 1st sess., 27, 1826.

Yalaka. A former Seminole town 35 m. w. of Volusia or Dexter, in w. Marion co., Fla.

Yalik. A Kaniagmiut Eskimo village on Nuka bay, e. coast of Kenai penin., Alaska; pop. 32 in 1880.—Petroff in Tenth Census, Alaska, 29, 1884.

Yalisumni. A former Maidu village near Salmon Falls, on the s. side of the South fork of American r., Eldorado co., Cal.—Dixon in Bull. Am. Mus. Nat. Hist., xvii, map, 1905.

Yamacraw. A detached town of the Creek confederacy, formerly on Yamacraw bluff, on the s. bank of Savannah r., in what is now the western suburb of Savannah, Ga. It was settled about 1730 by a small party of outlawed Creeks, with a few Yamasee, numbering in all about 17 or 18 families and 30 or 40 men, under the leadership of Tomochichi (q. v.), who for "some mischief in their own country" had been driven out from among the Lower Creek towns. In 1732 they asked and received from the South Carolina government formal permission to remain in their new settlement, and on the arrival of the Georgia colony under Oglethorpe in the next year Tomochichi made himself instrumental in bringing about a treaty between Georgia and the Lower Creeks, resulting in a reconciliation between himself and his tribe, with permission to bring other friends from the Creek towns to settle at the new location. The site was reserved by the Indians for their own use, but was probably abandoned soon after the death of Tomochichi in 1739.

The Indians of Yamacraw were not a distinct tribe, as has frequently been represented, but simply a refugee band of Creeks, who returned to their original homes after the ban had been removed. At the same time it seems evident that it was composed largely of descendants of those who had lived formerly in this neighborhood and had subsequently retired among the Creeks. The name is of uncertain etymology and seems to be a corrupted form, the Creek language having no r; neither has it any apparent connection with Yamasee. Nevertheless it should be compared with the Yamiscaron recorded as far back as the expedition of Ayllon in 1520-21. Consult Gatechet, Creek Migr. Leg., I, II, 1884, 1888; Jones, Hist. Sketch of Tomochichi, 1868; Jones, Hist. of Ga., 1883. (J. M. J. R. S.)

Yamako. A former Maidu village, about 9 m. E. of Nevada City, Nevada co., Cal.

Yamagatock.—Bancroft, Nat. Races, I, 450, 1874 (probably identical). Yamako.—Dixon in Bull. Am. Mus. Nat. Hist., xvii, map, 1905. Yumagatock.—Bancroft, op. cit.

Yamasee (a name of uncertain etymology, and evidently an abbreviated form). A former noted tribe of Muskhogean stock, best known in connection with early South Carolina history, but apparently occupying originally the coast region and islands of s. Georgia, and extending into Florida. From their residence near Savannah r. they have frequently been confused with the "Savannahs," or Shawano, and the Yuchi. Missions were established in their territory by the Spaniards about 1570, and they lived under the jurisdiction of the Spanish government of Florida until 1687, when, in consequence of an attempt to transport a number of their people as laborers to the West Indies, they revolted, attacked a number of the mission settlements and peaceful Indians, and then fled n. across Savannah r. to the English colony of South Carolina. They were allowed to settle within the present limits of Beaufort co., where at a later period they had several villages, the principal of which was Pocotaligo; others were Tolmato and Topiqui(?). They aided against the Tuscarora in 1712, but in 1715, in consequence of dissatisfaction with the traders, organized a combination against the English which included all, or nearly all, the tribes from C. Fear to the Florida border. The traders were slaughtered in the Indian towns and a general massacre of settlers took place along the Carolina frontier. After several engagements the Yamasee were finally defeated by Gov. Craven at Salkehuh (Saltketchers) on the Combahee and driven across the Savannah. They retired in a body to Florida where they were again received by the Spaniards and settled in villages near St Augustine. From that time they were known as allies of the Spaniards and enemies of the English, against whom they made frequent raids in company with other Florida Indians. A small part of them also appear to have taken refuge with the Catawba, where, according to Adair, they still retained their separate identity in 1743. In 1727 their village near St Augustine was attacked and destroyed by the English, and their Indian allies and most of the inhabitants were killed. In 1761 the remnant was said to number about 20 men, residing near St Augustine, and they seem also to have had a small settlement near Pensacola. The tradition of their destruction and enslavement by the Seminole is noted by several writers of this and a later period. As late as 1812 a small band retained the name among the Seminole, and some settled among the Hitchiti, but they have now completely disappeared. They were said to be darker than the Creeks, and "flat-footed," and from their proficiency as canoe men gave name to a particular method of rowing known as the "Yamasee stroke." (J. M.)

Yammostuwigaiya (Yäm-mos tu-wi-wa-gai-ya). A Mono band formerly living in Paradise valley, w. Nev.

Yäm-mos tu-wi-wa-gai-ya.—Powell, Pavlotso MS., B. A. E., 1881. Yam-mü's.—Powers, Inds. W. Nev., MS., B. A. E., 1876 (trans. 'big plains').

Yampa. A plant (Carum gairdneri) whose roots are much used for food by the Indians of the Oregon region, the Klamath, Umatilla, Ute, and others: from yämpä, the name of this plant in the Ute dialect of Shoshonean. (A. F. C.)

Yampa. A division of Ute formerly living in E. Utah on and about Green and Grand rs. In 1849 they occupied 500 lodges. The name does not appear in recent official reports, and the original Yampa are included under the term White River Ute. The Akanaquint and Grand River Ute were bands of this division.

Tamp-Pah-Utes.—Simpson (1859), Rep. of Expl. Across Utah, 35, 1876. Wampa.—Cummings in Ind. Aff. Rep., 153, 1866. Yampa.—U. S. Yampas. A former village connected with San Carlos mission, Cal., and said to have been Esselen.—Taylor in Cal. Farmer, Apr. 20, 1860.

Yan ('directly opposite' a ledge). A former Haida town on the w. side of the mouth of Masset inlet, Queen Charlotte ids., Brit. Col. It was built in comparatively recent times after troubles between two Masset families. One family stayed in Masset, while the other, the Aostlan-Inagai, settled at Yan.

Ya'an.—Boas, 12th Rep. N. W. Tribes Can., 23, 1898. Yan.—Dawson, Q. Charlotte Ids., 163, 1880. Yen.—Harrison in Proc. Roy. Soc. Can., sec. II, 124, 1895.

Yan. The Willow clan of the Tewa pueblo of Santa Clara, N. Mex.

Yä'n-tóá.—Hodge in Am. Anthr., IX, 352, 1896 (tóá = 'people').

Yana. A tribe, constituting a distinct linguistic family, formerly occupying the territory from Round mtn. near Pit r., Shasta co., to Deer cr., Tehama co., Cal. The w. boundary was about 10 m. E. of Sacramento r., both banks of that stream being held by the Wintun, with whom the Yana were frequently at war. The e. boundary extended along the spurs running out to the n. and s. from Lassen butte. In Aug. 1864 the neighboring miners organized a massacre of the whole tribe, then numbering about 3,000, of whom all but about 50 were slaughtered in the course of a few days. In 1902 Dixon reported only about half a dozen remaining. A number of their myths have been recorded by Curtin. Consult Powers in Cont. N. A. Ethnol., III, 1877, art. Nosi; Curtin, Creation Myths Prim. America, 1898. (H. W. H.)

Kom'-bo.—Powers in Cont. N. A. Ethnol., III, 277, 1877 (Maidu name). Nocsa.—Powers in Overland Mo., XII, 416, 1874. Nosa.—Curtin quoted by Powell in 6th Rep. B. A. E., xxxvii, 1888. Nol-Sas.—Geiger in Ind. Aff. Rep. 1859, 438, 1860. Noser.—Taylor in Cal. Farmer, Nov. 16, 1860. Nó-si.—Powers in Cont. N. A. Yanan Family. A linguistic family represented by the Yana tribe (q. v.).

—Nó-zi.—Powers in Cont. N. A. Ethnol., III, 275, 1877 (or Nó-si; mention of tribe; gives numerals and states they are different from any he has found in California). —Noses. —Gatschet in Mag. Am. Hist., 160, Mar., 1877 (or Noses; merely mentioned under Meidoo family). —Yanan. —Powell in 7th Rep. B. A. E., 125, 1891.

Yanatos. A former Choctaw village (Romans, Fla., 311, 1775), probably in s. w. Kemper co., Miss.

Yanoome. Mentioned as a pueblo of the province of Atripuy (q. v.), in the region of the lower Rio Grande, N. Mex., in 1598. —Oñate (1598) in Doc. Inéd., xvi, 115, 1871.

Yanogua (Yane'guu, 'Big-bear'). A Cherokee chief who appears to have been of considerable local prominence in his time, but whose name, even with the oldest of the band, is now but a memory. He was among the signers of the treaties of 1798 and 1805, and by the treaty of 1819 there was confirmed to him a tract of 640 acres as one of those living within the ceded territory who were "believed to be persons of industry and capable of managing their property with discretion," and who had made considerable improvements on the tracts reserved. This reservation, still known as the Big-bear farm, was on the w. bank of the Oconaluftee, a few miles above its mouth, and appears to have been the same afterward occupied by Yonaguska (q. v.). —Mooney in 19th Rep. B. A. E., 547, 1900.

Yanoka. The most southerly "old town" of the Chickasaw, first settled after the Chickasaw, Choctaw, and Chakchiuma separated on the e. side of the Mississippi. —Adair, Am. Inds., 68, 1775.

Yanoka. One of 5 hamlets composing the former Choctaw town of Imongalasha, in Neshoba co., Miss. —Halbert in Pub. Miss. Hist. Soc., vi, 432, 1902.

Yaneka ('at the little butte'). Former settlements of Klamath, Modoc, and Shoshoni along Middle Sprague r., Lake co., Oreg. The name is now applied to the seat of a subagency on Klamath res. —Gatschet in Cont. N. A. Ethnol., 11, pt. 1, xxxi; pt. 11, 100, 1890.

Yainakahi —Gatschet, op. cit. Yainakakni. —Ibid., 100 (referring to the people)

Yangua. A (Gabrieleño) rancharia formerly on the site of Los Angeles, Cal.

Iyakha. A L. Kroeber, Inf'n, 1905 (Lutsel's name so called from a plant growing abundantly there). Wenot. —Kroeber in Univ. Cal. Pub., Am. Eth. and Arch., viii, 39, 1908 ('stream'; so called by native informant "because of a large river there"). Yanga. —Ried (1852) quoted by Taylor in Cal. Farmer, June 8, 1860. Yang-ha. —Taylor, ibid. May 11, 1860. Yang-na. —Ried quoted by Hoffman in Bull. Essex Inst., xvii, 2, 1885.

Yangti (YANG'). The Buzzard clan of the Yuchi. —Speck, Yuchi Inds., 70, 1909.

Yangtsaa. The Coyote clan of Jemez pueblo, N. Mex. A corresponding clan existed also at the former related pueblo of Pecos.

Ya' + —Hodge in Am. Anthr., ix, 350, 1896 (Pecos name, + = ash = 'people'). Ya-tsaa. —Ibid. (Jemez form).

Yankapin. See Wampapin.

Yankton (ihante 'end,' ton'wa 'village,' 'end village'). One of the 7 primary divisions of the Dakota, constituting, with the closely related Yanktonai, the middle group. J. O. Dorsey arranged the Dakota-Assiniboin in 4 dialectic groups: Santee, Yankton, Teton, and Assiniboin, the Yankton dialect being spoken also by the Yanktonai, for the 2 tribes were the outgrowth of one original stem. Although the name Yankton was known earlier than Yanktonai, it does not follow that the Yankton were the elder tribe. Long (Exped. St. Peter's R., 1, 378, 1824) speaks of the Yankton as descendants of the Yanktonai. The Assiniboin, who were an offshoot from the Yanktonai, are mentioned in the Jesuit Relation for 1640 as a tribe;

EAGLE-TRACK — YANKTON

hence the Yanktonai must have been in existence as a tribe before that time. This fact serves as an aid in tracing back the Yankton both historically and geographically. However, the name Yankton and some of its synonyms appear early to have been used to include the 2 tribes, the distinction probably not then being known. The first mention of them is on Hennepin's map (1683), on which they are placed directly n. of Mille Lac, Munn, in the region of Leech lake or Red lake. This position would accord geographically with the withdrawal of the Assiniboin to the Cree. In the account of Hennepin's expedition attributed to Tonti (1697), they are mentioned in connection with the Santee, Teton, and Sioux, located about the headwaters of the Mississippi. Both these references would seem to apply as well to the Yanktonai as to the Yankton; it is probable that both are referred to under one general name. La Chesnaye (1697) included them among the tribes that dwelt n. of Mille Lac, and placed them n. of the Santee and other Sioux. Le Sueur (1700), however, speaks of a village or tribe of the western Sioux (Margry, Déc., vi, 87, 1887), the Hinhanetons, identified by Shea, probably correctly, with the Yankton, which he calls the "village of the quarry of red stone." If this refers, as is maintained by Williamson, to the pipestone quarry in extreme s. w. Minnesota, it would indicate a sudden change of residence, unless the references are in one place to one and in another to the other tribe, or apply to different villages or bands. Williamson (Minn. Hist. Coll., i, 296, 1860) considered the Hinhanetons a part only of the Yankton. There are indications that a westward movement took place about the time Le Sueur visited that region. On De l'Isle's map of 1708 the Yankton are placed on the e. bank of the Missouri, about the site of Sioux City, Iowa. For about a century they dropped almost entirely from history, there being scarcely a notice of them except as included in the general term Sioux. When they were again brought to notice by Lewis and Clark (1804) they had shifted but little from the position they occupied at the beginning of the previous century. According to these explorers they roamed over the regions of the James, Big Sioux, and Des Moines rs. Lewis, in his Statistical View, locates them on James, Big and Little Sioux, Floyd, and Des Moines rs., an area that includes the district of the pipestone quarry, where Le Sueur placed them. From this time they became an important factor in the history of the N. W. Long (1823) says that they are in every respect similar to the Yanktonai and had probably separated from them. They frequented the Missouri and generally trafficked with the traders on that river. Their hunting grounds were e. of the Missouri. Drake (1848) located them in 1836 about the headwaters of Red r. of the North. According to the Report on Indian Affairs for 1842 and a statement by Ramsey in 1849 they lived along Vermillion r., S. Dak. At the time of the Minnesota outbreak in 1862 their head chief, Palaneapape, wisely kept them from joining the hostiles, and sent warning to the white people in Dakota to flee to the forts, thereby saving hundreds of lives. By the treaty of Washington, Apr. 19, 1858, they ceded all their lands in South Dakota, excepting a reservation on the n.

bank of Missouri r., where they have since remained in peace with the whites. Immediately after the allotment act of 1887 the process of allotments in severalty began on this reservation and was completed before the close of 1890.

Lewis, in his Statistical View (1807), says the Yankton are the best disposed Sioux who rove on the banks of the Missouri, but they would not suffer any trader at that date to ascend the river if they could prevent it. Lewis and Clark describe them as being in person stout, well proportioned, and exhibiting a certain air of dignity and boldness. Their dress is described as differing in no respect from that of other bands encountered. They had then only a few guns, being generally armed with bows and arrows, in the use of which they did not appear as expert as the more northerly Indians. Pike describes them and the Yanktonai as never stationary, but, like the Teton, as more erratic than other Sioux. Lewis (1807) estimated their number at 700. Pike (1807) estimated the population of the Yankton and Yanktonai at 4,300. The Report on Indian Affairs for 1842 gives the Yankton a population of 2,500; in 1862 the estimate was 3,000; in 1867, 2,530; in 1886, 1,776. Their present number is not definitely known, the Yankton and the Yanktonai being seemingly confused on the different Sioux reservations. Most of the Indians under the Yankton school, S. Dak., are Yankton, and numbered in all 1,739 in 1909. There were also about 100 under the Fort Totten school, N. Dak., a few under the Crow Creek school, S. Dak., and a few others under the Lower Brulé school, S. Dak. The so-called Yankton on the Fort Peck res., Mont., are really Yanktonai.

The bands as given by J. O. Dorsey (1878) are as follows: Chankute, Chagu, Wakmuhaoin, Ihaisdaye, Wacheunpa, Ikmun, Oyateshicha, and Washichunchincha. Culbertson (Smithson. Rep. 1850, 141, 1851) mentions a "Band who do not cook," and another "Who eat no geese," which can not be identified with any of these divisions; and Schoolcraft (Ind. Tribes, iii, 612, 1853) incorrectly makes Wahnaataa, the name of one of the Yankton bands. (c. t.)

Yanktonai (ihanke 'end,' to'wan 'village,' na diminutive: 'little-end village.'—Riggs). One of the 7 primary divisions or subtribes of the Dakota, speaking the same dialect as the Yankton and believed to be the elder tribe. Long evidently obtained a tradition from the Indians to this effect. The first apparent reference to one of the tribes in which the other is not included is that to the Yankton by La Sueur in 1700. It is not until noticed by Lewis and Clark in 1804 that they reappear. These explorers state that they roved on the headwaters of the Sioux, James, and Red rs. The migration from their eastern home, N. of Mille Lac, Minn., probably took place at the beginning of the 18th century. It is likely that they followed or accompanied the Teton, while the Yankton turned more and more toward the S. W. Long (1823) speaks of them as one of the most important of the Dakota tribes, their hunting grounds extending from Red r. to the Missouri. Warren (1855) gives as their habitat the country between the James r. and the Missouri, extending as far N. as Devils lake, and states that they fought against the United States in the War of 1812, and that their chief at that time went to England. It does not appear that this tribe took any part in the Minnesota massacre of 1862. In 1865 separate treaties of peace were made with the United States by the Upper and Lower Yanktonai, binding them to use their influence and power to prevent hostilities not only against citizens, but also between the Indian tribes in the region occupied or frequented by them. Subsequently they were gathered on reservations, the Upper Yanktonai mostly at Standing Rock, partly also at Devils Lake, N. Dak.; the Lower Yanktonai (Hunkpatina) chiefly on Crow Creek res., S. Dak., but part at Standing Rock res., N. Dak., and some at Fort Peck res., Mont.

Their customs and characteristics are those common to the Dakota. Long (1823) states that they had no fixed residence, but dwelt in fine lodges of well-dressed and decorated skins, and frequented, for the purpose of trade, L. Traverse, Big Stone lake, and Cheyenne r. Their chief, Wanotan, wore a splendid cloak of buffalo skins, dressed so as to be a fine white color, which was decorated with tufts of owl feathers and others of various hues. His necklace was formed of about 60 claws of the grizzly bear, and his leggings, jacket, and moccasins were of white skins profusely decorated with human hair, the moccasins being variegated with plumage from several birds. In his hair, secured by a strip of red cloth, he wore 9 sticks, neatly cut and smoothed and painted with vermilion, which designated the number of gunshot wounds he had received. His hair was plaited in two tresses, which hung forward; his face was painted with vermilion, and in his hand he carried a large fan of turkey feathers.

The primary divisions of the tribe are Upper Yanktonai and Hunkpatina. These are really subtribes, each having its organization.

The first notice of subdivisions is that by Lewis and Clark, who mention the Kiyuksa, Wazikute, Hunkpatina, and the unidentified Hahatonwanna, Hone-taparteenwaz, and Zaartar. Hayden (1862) mentions the Hunkpatina, Pabaksa, and Wazikute, and speaks of two other bands, one called the Santee, and probably not Yanktonai. J. O. Dorsey gives as subdivisions, which he calls gentes, of the Upper Yanktonai: Wazikute, Takini, Shikshichena, Bakihon, Kiyuksa, Pabaksa, and another whose name was not ascertained. His subdivisions of the Hunkpatina are Putetemi, Shungikcheka, Takhuhayuta, Sanna, Ihasha, Iteghu, and Pteyuteshni. English translations of names of bands of Yanktonai of which little else is known are 'The band that wishes the life' and 'The few that lived.'

The population as given at different dates varies widely. Lewis and Clark (1806) estimate the men at 500, equal to a total of about 1,750; Long (1823), 5,200; Rep. Ind. Aff. for 1842, 6,000; Warren in 1856,

6,400; in 1867, 4,500; Ind. Aff. Rep. for 1874, 2,266; in 1885 returns from the agencies gave 6,618, while in 1886 the reported number was only 5,109. The Lower Yanktonai, or Hunkpatina, are chiefly under the Crow Creek school, S. Dak., where, together with some Lower Brulés, Miniconjou, and Two Kettles, they numbered 1,019 in 1909. There are others under the Standing Rock agency, N. Dak., but their number is not separately enumerated. The Upper Yanktonai are chiefly under the Standing Rock agency, and while their number is not separately reported, there are probably about 3,500 at this place. The Pabaksa branch of the Upper Yanktonai are under the Ft Totten school, N. Dak., but their number is not known. The so-called "Yankton Sioux" under the Ft Peck agency, Mont., are in reality chiefly Yanktonai. These, with several other Sioux tribes, numbered 1,082 in 1909. (C. T.)

Yaqui (said to mean 'chief river,' referring to the Rio Yaqui). An important division of the Cahita which until recently dwelt along both banks of the lower Rio Yaqui, but is now scattered over the larger part of s. Sonora, Mexico. The first notice of the tribe is probably the narrative of the expedition in 1531 by Nuño de Guzman (Segunda Rel. Anón., in Icazbalceta, Col. Docs., II, 300-02, 1866), in which they are spoken of as related linguistically to the people living on Rio de Fuerte, a relationship that has since been fully confirmed (see Cahita). Capt. Hurdade made 3 successive attacks on the tribe (1609-10), the last time with 50 mounted Spaniards and 4,000 Indian allies, but was defeated and forced to retreat each time. The Yaqui made overtures of peace, a treaty with the Spaniards was made in 1610, and soon thereafter missionaries began to visit them. Perez de Ribas, a missionary among them between 1624 and 1644, says they were then agriculturists, cultivating not only maize, but also cotton, which they manufactured into cloth, especially mantles. The first serious revolt against the Spaniards occurred in 1740, and was brought on, according to Alegre (Hist. Comp. Jesus, III, 273, 1842), by disputes between Spanish settlers and the missionaries. There was a second outbreak in 1764. The more recent uprisings were in 1825, 1832, 1840, 1867, 1885, and 1901. Hrdlička (Am. Anthr., VI, 61, 1904), who speaks highly of the capabilities of the Yaqui, says: "This is the only tribe on the continent that, surrounded by whites from the beginning of their history, have never been fully subdued." Their native dwellings, in which many of them still live, are quadrilateral structures of poles and reeds, or adobes and reeds or brush, with flat or slightly sloping roofs of grass and mud. These are generally of fair size, with adjoining shelters where the cooking and the other indoor work is done. Their principal industries are agriculture and cattle raising, and the manufacture of cotton and woolen stuffs. They also make hats and fine mats of palm leaf and reed baskets, which they sell at Guaymas. Many of them are employed as laborers in the fields and mines. A few ornaments, as rings, earrings, and beads, are made from silver and other metals. According to Hrdlička (op. cit., 68), there is no organization among the Yaqui, except in that part of the tribe which lives practically free and conducts the revolutions; nor do there appear to be any secret societies. Marriage, natal, and mortuary ceremonies are mainly Roman Catholic; the women marry young; the dead are buried in graves. They had a former custom of exchanging wives. Their principal settlements have been Bacum, Belen (with others), Bicom, Corcori, Huirivis, Potam, Rahun, and Torin. Estimates of the population of the tribe have varied widely at different dates. The earliest guess, that for 1621, was 30,000; Zapata (1678) reported the population of the 7 principal Yaqui pueblos as 8,118; while in 1760, according to Jesuit accounts, the population of 8 chief settlements was 19,325 (Escudero Not. Estad. Sonora y Sinaloa, 100, 1849). Escudero gives the population in 1849 at 54,000 to 57,000. Stone estimated their number in 1860 at 20,000, which Hrdlička considers approximately correct for 1903. In 1906-7 the Mexican government undertook a plan to overcome permanently the hostile Yaqui by deporting them to Tehuantepec and Yucatan, to which parts several thousand accordingly have been sent.

Yaquina. A small tribe, but the most important division of the Yakonan family (q. v.), formerly living about Yaquina r. and bay, w. Oregon. By the early explorers and writers they were classed with the Salishan tribes to the s., but later were shown to be linguistically independent. The tribe is now practically extinct. There are a few survivors, for the greater part of mixed blood, on the Siletz res., Oreg. According to Dorsey (Jour. Am. Folk-lore, III, 229, 1890) the following were villages of the Yaquina: On the n. side of Yaquina r.: Holukhik, Hunkkhwitik, Iwai, Khaibuk, Khilukh, Kunnupiyu, Kwulai, shauik, Kyaukuhu, Kyuwatkal, Mipshuntik, Mittsulitik, Shash, Thlakhaiuntik, Thlekakhaik, Tkhakiyu, Tshkitshauk, Tthilkitik, Ukhwaiksh, Yahal, Yikhaich. Yatasi. A tribe of the Caddo confederacy, closely affiliated in language with the Natchitoch. They are first spoken of by Tonti, who states that in 1690 their village was on Red r. of Louisiana, N. W. of the Natchitoch, where they were living in company with the Natasi and Choye. Bienville and St Denys, during their Red r. trip in 1701, made an alliance with the Yatasi and henceforward the tribe seems to have been true to the friendship then sealed. The road frequented by travelers from the Spanish province to the French settlements on Red r. and at New Orleans passed near their village. During the disputes incident to the uncertain boundary line between the Spanish and the French possessions and to the Spanish restrictions on intertrade, they proved their steadfastness to the French interests by refusing to comply with the Spanish demand to close the road. The Indians maintained that "the road had always been theirs" and that it should remain open. St Denys' invitation to the various tribes dwelling in the vicinity of the post and fort established among the Natchitoch in 1712-14 to settle near by under his protection was opportune, for the Chickasaw were then waging war along Red r. and the Yatasi were among the sufferers. A part of the tribe sought refuge with the Natchitoch, while others fled up the river to the Kadohadacho and to the Nanatsoho and the Nasoni. The wars of the 18th century and the introduction of new diseases, especially smallpox and measles, had such an effect on the Yatasi that by 1805, according to Sibley, they had become reduced to 8 men and 25 women and children. This remnant was then living in a village midway between the Kadohadacho and the Natchitoch, surrounded by French settlements. In 1826 (U. S. Ind. Treat., 465, 1826) they numbered 26 on Red r. Little more than the name of the Yatasi now survives, and those who claim descent from the tribe live with the Caddo on the Wichita res. in Oklahoma. (A. C. F.)

Yawilchine. A Yokuts (Mariposan) tribe, not further identifiable, probably living formerly between Kaweah and Tule rivers, Cal. They joined with other tribes ceding lands to the United States under the treaty of May 30, 1851, when they were placed on a reserve. In 1882 the Yawitenni were mentioned as on Tule River. The word may be only a dialectic synonym of Yaudanchi, plural Yowechani or Yowedchani, which in certain dialects could become Yowelchani. (A. L. K.)

Yayahaye. A Maricopa rancheria on the Rio Gila, Ariz., in 1744.—Sedelmair (1744) cited by Bancroft, Ariz. and N. Mex., 366, 1889.

Yayaponchatu. A traditional people who once lived in a single village N. of Oraibi, N. E. Ariz. In Hopi story they are said to have been in league with supernatural forces, and by means of fire have destroyed the villages of Pivanankapi and Hushkovi, at the instance of the chief of the former, because his people had become degenerate through drinking.—Voth, Traditions of the Hopi, 1905.

Yatustenuggee. See Great Mortar.

Yazoo (meaning unknown). An extinct tribe and village formerly on lower Yazoo r., Miss. Like all the other tribes on the stream, the Yazoo were small in number. The people were always closely allied with the Koroa, whom they aided in employing an r in speaking, like most of the neighboring tribes. In 1718 erected a fort 4 leagues from the mouth of Yazoo r. to the Yazoo stream, which formed the boundary to the Chickasaw country. In imitation of the Natchez, the Yazoo and Koroa rose against the French, destroyed the fort, but both tribes were finally expelled (Shea, Cath. Miss., 1855) and probably united with the Chickasaw and Choctaw. Whether they had any connection with the Yazoo and East Yazoo towns among the Chickasaw is not known. See Gatschet, 1st Rep. Leg., I, 1884.

Yazoo (or Yashu). A former important Choctaw town, belonging to the Uklafalaya, situated in Neshobaco., Miss., near the headwaters of Oktibbeha cr. The site is still called Yazoo Old Town. Tecumseh visited this place in the fall of 1811. It is often mentioned in Government records and was the town where the commissioners appointed to investigate the Choctaw claims under the 14th article of the treaty of Dancing Rabbit cr. held their sessions from Apr. 6 to Aug. 24, 1843. It was sometimes called West Yazoo to distinguish it from another town of the name.—Halbert in Pub. Miss. Hist. Soc., VI, 427, 1902.

Yazoo Skatane (Yashu Iskitini, 'little Yazoo'). A former Choctaw town on both banks of Yazoo cr., an affluent of Petickfa cr., on the N. side, in Kemper co., Miss. It extended up Yazoo cr. for about a mile to where there is an important fork. It was called East Yazoo Skatane by Romans to distinguish it from Yazoo (q. v.).—Halbert in Pub. Miss. Hist. Soc., VI, 422-23, 1902.

East Yazoo.—Romans, Florida, 80, 1775.

Ybdacax. A tribe named in 1708 in a list of those which had been met or heard of N. of San Juan Bautista mission, on the lower Rio Grande (Fr. Isidro Felix de Espinosa, "Relacion Compendiosa" of the Rio Grande missions, MS. in archives of College of Santa Cruz de Querétaro). (H. E. B.)

Ye. The Lizard clan of the Tewa pueblos of San Juan and San Ildefonso, N. Mex.

Yé-tóá.—Hodge in Am. Anthr., IX, 351, 1896 (tdóá = 'people').

Yecora. A pueblo of the Opata and seat of a Spanish mission founded in 1673, situated in N. E. Sonora, Mexico, probably on Rio Soyopa. Pop. 356 in 1678, 197 in 1730.

Icora.—Alegre in Bancroft, No. Mex. States, I, 523, 1884 (probably identical). San Ildefonso Yecora.—Zapata (1678), ibid., 245. Yecora.—Rivera (1730), ibid., 513. Yecorí.—Orozco y Berra, Geog., 343, 1864.

Yellow Lake. A Chippewa village, established about 1740 on Yellow lake, Burnett co., Wis. —Warren (1852) in Minn. Hist. Soc. Coll., v, 171, 1885.

Yellow Liver Band. An unidentified Sioux band, named from its chief, and numbering 60 lodges when brought to Ft. Peck agency in Aug. 1872. H. R. Ex. Doc. 96, 42d Cong., 3d sess., 15, 1873.

Yellow Thunder (Wa-kun-cha-kuo-kah). A Winnebago chief, said to have been born in 1774, died in 1874. Prior to 1840 the Winnebago occupied the country surrounding L. Winnebago and Green bay, Wis. When it was determined to remove the Indians to a new reservation in N. E. Iowa and s. e. Minnesota, Yellow Thunder, with others of his tribe, was persuaded to visit Washington and "get acquainted with the Great Father." Here, on Nov. 1, 1837, they were induced to sign a treaty ceding to the United States all their lands e. of the Mississippi, and providing for their removal to the W. within eight months. The Indians claimed that they were misled into believing that they had eight years in which to make the change, consequently at the expiration of the stipulated time they were unwilling to go. In 1840 troops were sent to Portage to remove the Indians by force, and Yellow Thunder, through a false report that he intended to revolt, was put in chains, he was soon released, however, and the removal was effected without further trouble. Within a year Yellow Thunder and his wife reappeared at their old home and entered a tract of 40 acres as a homestead on the w. side of Wisconsin r. about 8 m. above Portage. Here he lived quietly until his death in

Feb. 1874. Yellow Thunder was greatly respected by his people; he was an able counsellor in their public affairs, industrious, temperate, and a zealous Catholic. His portrait, painted by S. D. Coates, is in the gallery of the Wisconsin Historical Society, and a monument to his memory has been erected a few miles n. of Baraboo, Wis.

YELLOW THUNDER. (WISCONSIN HISTORICAL SOCIETY)

Yellow Thunder. A former Winnebago village, named after its chief, at Yellow Banks, Green Lake co., Wis. —Whittlesey (1854) in Wis. Hist. Soc. Coll., I, 74, repr. 1903.

Yellow Wolf. A local band of the Cheyenne in 1850. (J. M.)

Yelma. A village, presumably Costanoan, whose inhabitants are mentioned as at San Juan Bautista and Dolores missions, Cal.

Yelamu'. —Taylor in Cal. Farmer, Oct. 18, 1861 (at Dolores mission). Yelma. —Engelhardt, Franciscans in Cal., 398, 1897 (at San Juan Bautista mission).

Yenyedi (Y'nyē'dī, 'mainland people'). A Tlingit division on Taku inlet, Alaska, belonging to the Wolf phratry. (J. R. S.)

Yenyohol. Mentioned by Oviedo (Hist. Gen. Indies, III, 628, 1853) as a province or village visited by Ayllon, probably on the South Carolina coast, in 1520. In the Documentos Inéditos (xiv, 506, 1870) the name is spelled Yenyochol.

Yepachic. (Tarahumare: yēpá 'snow,' chik 'place of.') A rancharia on the extreme headwaters of the Rio Aros, a tributary of the Yaqui, in w. Chihuahua, Mexico. It seemingly was originally a Tarahumare settlement, but in 1902 was inhabited by Mexicans and about 20 Nevome, or Southern Pima, with a half-caste Tarahumare as its presidente.—Lumholtz, Unknown Mex., 1, 124–128, 1902.

Santiago Yepachic.—Orozco y Berra, Geog., 324, 1864.

Yesheken (Yē'ceqen). A division of the Nanaimo on the E. coast of Vancouver id., Brit. Col.—Boas in 5th Rep. N. W. Tribes Can., 32, 1889.

Yesito. A former village, probably Cadloan, near and presumably connected with the Yatasi on Red r. in n. w. Louisiana at the close of the 17th century.—Iberville (1699) in Margry, Déc., iv, 178, 1880.

Yenaba. A Costanoan village situated in 1819 within 10 m. of Santa Cruz mission, Cal.—Taylor in Cal. Farmer, Apr. 5, 1860.

Yennata. A Costanoan village situated in 1819 within 10 m. of Santa Cruz mission, Cal.—Taylor in Cal. Farmer, Apr. 5, 1860.

Yennator. A Costanoan village situated in 1819 within 10 m. of Santa Cruz mission, Cal.—Taylor in Cal. Farmer, Apr. 5, 1860.

Yguases. An unidentified Texas tribe with whom Cabeza de Vaca lived during his stay in Texas in 1527–34. They dwelt inland from the Guaycones and s. e. of the Atayos. The buffalo herds reached their country, but the people used the skins mainly for robes and moccasins. They are spoken of as a well-formed, symmetrical people, good archers, and great runners. They hunted the deer by running the animal down. Cabeza de Vaca speaks of their using "bucklers" of buffalo hide. Their houses were of mats placed upon four hoops. When moving camp the mats were rolled in a bundle and carried on the back. The men perforated the lip and the nipple, and wore a reed thrust through the openings. They planted "nothing from which to profit" and subsisted mainly on roots, frequently suffering long fasts. During these painful periods they bade Cabeza de Vaca "not to be sad, there would soon be prickly-pears," although the season of this fruit of the cactus might be months distant. When the pears were ripe the people feasted and danced and forgot their former privations. They destroyed their female infants to prevent them being taken by their enemies and thus becoming the means of increasing the latter's numbers. They seem to have been more closely related by custom to tribes near the coast, like the Karankawa, than to the agricultural people toward the n. and w. So far as known the tribe is extinct. (A. C. F.)

Yodok. A former Maidu village on the E. bank of American r., just below the junction of South fork, Sacramento co., Cal.—Dixon in Bull. Am. Mus. Nat. Hist., xvii, map, 1905.

Yogoyekaydn ('juniper'). An Apache band or clan at San Carlos agency and Ft Apache, Ariz., in 1881.—Bourke in Jour. Am. Folk-lore, iii, 112, 1890.

Yoholomicco (yahólo, 'hallooer,' an initiation title; miko, 'chief'). A Creek chief, born on Coosa r., Ga., about 1790; died in Arkansas about 1838. He was headman of

YOHOLOMICCO

Eufaula town, a warrior of prowess, and one of the most persuasive orators in the Creek nation. Of the party of Mac-Intosh, he fought under Gen. Jackson against the rebel Creeks in 1813-14, and subsequently signed the various treaties ceding Creek lands and agreeing to emigrate beyond the Mississippi. He died of the hardships of the journey when the removal took place, having previously lost his chieftaincy and seat in the council on account of his complaisance to the whites. (F. H.)

Yojuane. A Tonkawan tribe of northern and central Texas, frequently mentioned in 18th century Spanish records. Since their general history, customs, and ethnological relations are outlined under Tonkawa, only a few characteristic facts concerning them need be given here.

The Yojuane and Tonkawa tribes were unmistakably mentioned in 1691 by Francisco de Jesus María as the "DiuJuan" and the "Tanqua ay," among the enemies of the Hasinai. It is probable that the Ayennis, spoken of in 1698 by Talon, and the Yakwal ('drifted ones') remembered, according to Gatschet, in Tonkawa tradition, were the Yojuane. That the Joyvan met by Du Rivage in 1719 on Red r., 70 leagues above the Kadohadacho, were the same tribe, there is little room for doubt (see Francisco de Jesus María, Relación, 1691, MS; Interrogations faites à Pierre et Jean Talon, 1698, in Margry, Déc., iii, 616, 1878; LaHarpe, ibid., vi, 277, 1886; and cf. Yakwal).

Throughout the 18th century the Yojuane shared the common Tonkawan hatred for the Apache. There are indications of an early hostility toward the Hasinai also. For example, about 1714 (the chronology is not clear), according to Espinosa they burned the Neche village and destroyed the main fire temple of the Hasinai confederacy. Ramón in 1716 likewise mentions them among the enemies of the Hasinai (Espinosa, Crónica Apostólica, pt. i, 424, 1746; Dictamen Fiscal, MS., in Mem. de Nueva España, xxvii, 193). Before the middle of the century, however, these relations with the Hasinai seem to have been changed, and in the latter half of the century the tribes frequently went together against the Apache.

The Yojuane tribe comes most prominently into notice between 1746 and 1756, in connection with the San Xavier missions on San Gabriel r., Texas. The four chiefs who went to San Antonio to ask for the missions were of the "Yojuanes, Deadozes, Maieyes, and Rancheria Grande," and Yojuane were among the neophytes gathered at the missions established as a result of that request. With some exceptions the indications are that by the middle of the 18th century the tribe had moved southward with the Tonkawa into central Texas. One of these exceptions is the statement that they had a village on Rio del Fierro, between San Sabá and the Taovayas (the Wichita r., perhaps), but that about 1750 it was destroyed by the Lipan, when the Yojuane fled to the Tonkawa, one of their number becoming a chief of that tribe (Cabello to Loyola, Bexar Archives, Province of Texas, 1786, MS.). The village on the Rio del Fierro could not have been the permanent residence of a large part of the tribe, for several times before this the Yojuane are referred to as living near the Hasinai, who were in E. Texas. In 1772 the Yocovane, apparently the Yojuane, were included by Mezières among the Tonkawa. This is one of several indications that the Yojuane tribe was absorbed by the Tonkawa in the latter half of the 18th century. In 1819 Juan Antonio de Padilla wrote in his report on the Texas Indians that a tribe of 190 people called "Yuganis," and having customs like the "Cadó," lived "east of Nacodoches on the Nechas river." Terán, in 1828, called what appears to be the same tribe the "Yguanes." These names suggest the Yojuane, whom they may possibly have been, but it seems improbable that they were identical (Padilla, Indios Barbaros de Texas, 1819, MS.; Terán, Noticia, in Bol. Soc. Geog. Mex., 269, Apr. 1870). (H. E. B.)

Yokulme (Yū-kul'-mē). A former Maidu village on the W. bank of Feather r., near Starr's Landing, Sutter co., Cal., with 12 inhabitants in 1856. Probably the same as Kulme. (R. B. D.)

Yukulmey.—Taylor in Cal. Farmer, June 8, 1860. Yukutneys.—Bancroft, Nat. Races, I, 450, 1874.

Yokuts. See Mariposan Family.

Yolanar. Mentioned as a Creek town (H. R. Ex. Doc. 276, 24th Cong., 300, 1836). It was more likely Seminole and was probably a branch town of Chiaha on Apalachicola r., Fla. Possibly the same as the modern name Iola.

Yolo (said to mean 'region thick with rushes'). A Patwin tribe after which Yolo co., Cal., was named. There were 45 of the tribe living in Yolo co. in 1884. Tolenos.—Taylor in Cal. Farmer, Mar. 30, 1860 (probable misprint for Yolenos). Yolays.—Bancroft, Nat. Races, I, 362, 1874. Yolos.—Taylor in Cal. Farmer, June 8, 1860. Yoley.—Bancroft, Nat. Races, I, 450, 1874 (proper form, meaning 'a region thick with rushes'). Yoleytoy.—Bancroft, Hist. Cal., IV, 71, 1886.

Yonaguska (properly Yá'nú-gúñ'skí, 'The bear drowns him,' whence his common name 'Drowning-bear'). The adopted father of Col. Win. H. Thomas, and the most prominent chief in the history of the East Cherokee, although, singularly enough, his name does not occur in connection with any of the early wars or treaties. This is due partly to the fact that he was a peace chief and counselor rather than a war leader, and in part to the fact that the isolated position of the mountain Cherokee kept them aloof, in a great measure, from the tribal councils of those living to the W. and S. In person he was strikingly handsome, being 6 ft 3 in. in height and strongly built, with a faint tinge of red, due to a slight strain of white blood on his father's side, relieving the brown of his cheeks. In power of oratory he is said to have surpassed any other chief of his day. When the Cherokee lands on Tuckasegee r. were sold by the treaty of 1819, Yonaguska continued to reside on a reservation of 640 acres in a bend of the river a short distance above the present Bryson City, N. Car., on the site of the ancient Kituhwa. He afterward moved over to Oconaluftee, and finally, after the removal, gathered his people about him and settled with them on Soco cr. on lands purchased for them by Thomas. He was a prophet and reformer as well as a chief. When about 60 years of age he had a severe illness, terminating in a trance, during which his people mourned him as dead. At the end of 24 hours, however, he awoke to consciousness and announced that he had been to the spirit world, where he had talked with friends who had gone before, and with God, who had sent him back with a message to the Indians, promising to call him again at a later time. From that day until his death his words were listened to as those of one inspired. He had been somewhat addicted to liquor, but now, on the recommendation of Thomas, not only stopped drinking himself, but organized his tribe into a temperance society. To accomplish this he called his people together in council, and, after clearly pointing out to them the serious effect of intemperance, in an eloquent speech that moved some of his audience to tears, he declared that God had permitted him to return to earth especially that he might thus warn his people and banish whisky from among them. He then had Thomas write out a pledge, which was signed first by the chief and then by each one of the council, and from that time until after his death whisky was unknown among the East Cherokee. Although frequent pressure was brought to bear to induce him and his people to remove to the W., he firmly resisted every persuasion, declaring that the Indians were safer from aggression among their rocks and mountains than they could ever be in a land which the white man could find profitable, and that the Cherokee could be happy only in the country where nature had planted him. While counseling peace and friendship with the white man, he held always to his Indian faith and was extremely suspicious of missionaries. On one occasion, after the first Bible translation into the Cherokee language and alphabet, some one brought a copy of Matthew from New Echota, but Yonaguska would not allow it to be read to his people until it had first been read to himself. After listening to one or two chapters the old chief dryly remarked: "Well, it seems to be a good book—strange that the white people are not better, after having had it so long." He died, aged about 80, in Apr. 1839, within a year after the removal. Shortly before the end he had himself carried into the townhouse on Soco cr., of which he had supervised the building, where, extended on a couch, he made a last talk to his people, commending Thomas to them as their chief and again warning them earnestly against ever leaving their own country. Then wrapping his blanket around him, he quietly lay back and died. He was buried beside Soco, about a mile below the old Macedonia mission, with a rude mound of stones to mark the spot. He left two wives and considerable property, including an old negro slave named Cudjo, who was devotedly attached to him. One of his daughters, Katalsta, still (1909) survives, and is the last conservator of the potter's art among the East Cherokee. (J. M.)

Yonalus. Mentioned by Oñate (Doc. Inéd., xvi, 113, 1871) as a pueblo of New Mexico in 1598. Doubtless situated in the Salinas, in the vicinity of Abo, E. of the Rio Grande. It seemingly pertained to either the Tigua or the Piro.

Xonalús.—Bancroft, Ariz. and N. Mex., 135, 1889 (misprint). Yonalins.—Columbus Mem. Vol., 154, 1893 (misprint.)

Yoncopin. See Wampapin.

Yonh ('hickory-nut'). A Yuchi clan. Yó'h tahá.—Gatschet, Uchee MS., B. A. E., 71, 1885 (= 'hickory-nut gens').

Yonkalla. The southernmost Kalapooian tribe, formerly living on Elk and Calapooya crs., tributaries of Umpqua r., Oreg. According to Gatschet there were two bands, called Chayankeld and Tsantokayu by the Lakmiut, but it seems likely that the former name (Tch' Ayan-kē'ld) is merely the native tribal name. The tribe is probably extinct. (L. F.)

Ayankeld.—Gatschet in Jour. Am. Folk-lore, xii, 212, 1899. Jamkallie.—Latham in Jour. Ethnol. Soc. Lond., i, 158, 1848. Tch' Ayankē'ld.—Gatschet, Calapooya MS., B. A. Yonora. A former Tepehuane pueblo in Durango, Mexico; the seat of the mission of San Miguel.

S. Miguel Yonora.—Orozco y Berra, Geog., 318, 1864.

Yontuh ('acorn'). A Yuchi clan. Yontu'h tahá.—Gatschet, Uchee MS., B. A. E., 71, 1885 (= 'acorn gens').

Yoo ('beads'). A Navaho clan. Yoo.—Matthews in Jour. Am. Folk-lore, iii, 104, 1890.

Yopon (yanpon). (1) The Southern traders' name of Ilex cassine, an elegant species of holly growing to a height of 10 or 15 feet in close proximity to the coast. (2) A beverage prepared from the torrefied leaves, and possessing the properties of an exhilarant and gentle diuretic. This beverage, called by the British traders "black drink" (q. v.), from the color of the strong infusion, was drunk by the Creeks at their "busk" (see Busk), and by the elders when assembled in council or when discussing everyday topics. The infusion was used for different purposes, according to its strength. Like the leaves of Ilex paraguayensis (maté), guayusa, cacao, guarana, tea, and coffee, the leaves of the holly under consideration owe their property of a nerve excitant to the alkaloid theine which they contain. The inhabitants of the Southern seaboard still annually collect and dry the leaves and use them as tea, which, however, is oppressively sudorific, at least to those who are unaccustomed to the use of it. The name is from Catawba yopín, a diminutive of yop, 'tree,' 'shrub.' (W. R. G.)

Yoquibo (yōkí 'bluebird', iro 'mesa': 'bluebird on the mesa'). A Tarahumare village between the mining settlements of Batopilas and Zapuri, near the extreme headwaters of the Rio Fuerte, in the Sierra Madre, w. Chihuahua, Mexico.—Lumholtz, Unknown Mex., i, 180, 1902.

Yoricas. A former tribe of s. Texas, perhaps Coahuiltecan, members of which were encountered by Fernando del Bosque, in 1675, in company with some of the Hapes.

Goricas.—Revillagigedo (1793) quoted by Orozco y Berra, Geog., 306, 1864. Goxicas.—Revillagigedo quoted by Bancroft, Nat. Races, i, 611, 1886. Yoricas.—Fernando del Bosque (1675) in Nat. Geog. Mag., xiv, 343, 1903.

Yorkjough. A Seneca village about 12 m. from Anagangaw (Honeoye, q. v.) and about 6 m. from New Genesee, probably in Livingston co., N. Y., destroyed by Gen. Sullivan in 1779.—Livermore (1779) in N. H. Hist. Soc. Coll., vi, 328, 1850.

Yoroonwago. A Seneca village formerly situated on upper Allegheny r., near the present Corydon, Warren co., Pa. It was one of the towns in the Seneca settlement that extended for nearly 8 m. along the Allegheny before 1779, near the later Cornplanter (Seneca) res., N. Y. This village is mentioned by this name by Col. Brodhead, to whom the name was given by John Montour. No such name appears on any of the maps of the period. It was probably situated at or near the village noted on Ellicott's map of 1786 as Tushhanushagota (Arch. Pa., xi, map, 1855); it is also noted on the Historical Map of Pennsylvania (Hist. Soc. Pa., 1875) as Tayunchoneyu, but is wrongly located below Conewango (Warren, Pa.), whereas according to Brodhead's statement it was 20 m. above that place. (G. P. D.)

Yorotees. Given by Ker (Trav., 139, 1816) as a tribe living 80 m. s. sw. of Red r., apparently in w. Texas, but "on a lake called by the natives Testzapotecas," and numbering 5,000. The so-called tribe is evidently imaginary.

Yotammoto. A former Maidu village near Genesee, Plumas co., Cal.—Dixon in Bull. Am. Mus. Nat. Hist., xvii, map, 1905.

Yotlik. An Eskimo village in w. Greenland, lat. 73° 40'.—Kane, Arct. Explor., ii, 52, 1856.

Youahnoe. Given in John Work's list (Schoolcraft, Ind. Tribes, v, 488, 1855) as the name of a Kaigani town having 18 houses and 234 inhabitants in 1836–41. It may possibly have been the summer town of Kaigani.

Youghtanund. A tribe of the Powhatan confederacy living on the s. bank of Pamunkey r., Va., perhaps in Hanover co. Pop. in 1608 estimated at about 240.

Youghtamund.—Strachey (ca. 1612), Va., 35, 1849. Youghtanund.—Smith (1629), Va., i, 117, repr. 1819. Youthtanundo.—Simons, ibid., 160.

Young Man Afraid of His Horses. A chief of the Oglala Sioux, contemporaneous with Red Cloud and one of the leading lieutenants of the latter in the war of 1866 to defeat the building of the Montana road through the buffalo pastures of Powder r. His Sioux name, Tasunkakokipapi, is not properly interpreted; it really means that the bearer was so potent in battle that the mere sight of his horses inspired fear. After the peace of 1868 he lived at the Oglala agency and died at Pine Ridge, S. Dak. (D. R.)

Youpon. See Black drink, Yopon.

Yowani (probably 'the cutworm,' or 'the caterpillar'). A former important Choctaw town on Chickasawhay r., a mile or two s. of the modern town of Shubuta, Clarke co., Miss. The territory belonging to it extended westward to the eastern dividing ridge of Bogue Homa, northward as far as Pachuta cr., and southward perhaps as far as the confluence of Chickasawhay and Buckatunnas. Its eastern boundaries are unknown. It is often mentioned by Adair and other contemporary writers. It seems that at one time during the 18th century it was included among the Sixtowns people, and the entire district was then sometimes called Seventowns. It was perhaps in 1764 that a band of Yowani separated from the main clan, emigrated to Louisiana, and united with the Caddo, forming the Yowani band in the Caddo tribe, an organization nearly extinct in 1892. All the remaining Yowani living in their ancient territory removed in 1832, in the second emigration, except two families, whose descendants still live in Mississippi. Some Yowani Choctaw settled about 4 m. n. of Lecompte, Rapides parish, La., but the settlement was probably abandoned before 1850; others went to the Chickasaw Nation, Ind. Ter., where they gained a livelihood as trappers; others settled between Red r. and Bayou Natchitoches, La., while a few passed into Texas. Consult Adair, Am. Inds., 1775; Gatschet, Creek Migr. Leg., i, 79, 1884; Halbert (1) in Pub. Ala. Hist. Soc., Misc. Coll., i, 380, 1901; (2) in Pub. Miss. Hist. Soc., III, 370, 1900; VI, 403-410, 1902.

Hi'-puk.—Henshaw, Buenaventura MS. vocab., B. A. E., 1881. Ypuc.—Taylor in Cal. Farmer, July 24, 1863.

Ysbupue. A tribe named in 1708 in a list of those which had been met or heard of n. of San Juan Bautista mission, on the lower Rio Grande (Fr. Isidro Felix de Espinosa, "Relación Compendiosa" of the Rio Grande missions, MS. in archives of College of Santa Cruz de Querétaro, Mexico). (H. E. B.)

Yscanis. A tribe of the Wichita confederacy; they were entirely distinct from the Asinais (Hasinai), though the names of the two tribes have been confused. It is possible that the Ysconis, or Isconis, reported to Domingo de Mendoza in 1684 among the tribes awaiting him somewhere in central or E. Texas, were the Yscanis (Mendoza, Viage, 1683-84, MS.). In 1719 LaHarpe visited them (the "Ascanis") on Canadian r., where they were living a settled life with the Wichita, Taovayas (Tawehash), and Tawakoni. LaHarpe also reported another village of the Ascanis 60 leagues farther to the n. w. (Margry, Déc., VI, 293, 1886). Little more is heard of these tribes till the middle of the 18th century, by which time they had all moved southward into N. Texas, under pressure from their bitter enemies, the Comanche and the Osage. According to an official report made in 1762, the Yscanis had been among the numerous tribes which, about 1746, asked the missionaries at San Antonio for missions in central Texas. If this be true, they were possibly the Hiscas, or Haiscas, mentioned in documents relating to the San Xavier missions (Royal cédulas of Apr. 6, 1748, and Mar. 21, 1752, MSS. in Archivo Gen. de México). In 1760 Fr. Calahorra y Saenz, of Nacogdoches, went among the Yscanis and Tawakoni to establish peace, and soon afterward made an unsuccessful attempt to found a mission for them. These two tribes were at that time living close together on a stream in N. Texas, apparently farther N. than the place where Mezières found them a decade later (contemporary docs. in Béxar Archives). The Yscanis took part in the peace conference held by Mezières in 1770 at the Kadohadacho village, and two years later they sent representatives to Béxar to ratify the convention before the governor of Texas. When, in 1772, Mezières visited the tribe, they were living near the E. bank of the Trinity, somewhere below the present Palestine, 7 leagues E. of one of the Tawakoni villages, and an equal distance W. of the Kichai. The village consisted of 60 warriors and their families. They lived in a scattered agricultural settlement, raised maize, beans, melons, and calabashes, were closely allied with the other Wichita tribes, whose language they spoke, and were said by Mezières to be cannibals. There are indications that after this the Yscanis united with the Tawakoni, with whom they had always been most closely associated, to reappear, perhaps, in the 19th century, as the Waco. In his reports of his expeditions made in 1778 and 1779 to the Wichita tribes Mezières does not mention the Yscanis, but he fully describes the two Tawakoni villages, then both on the Brazos. Morfi, about 1782, on what authority is not known, states that the "Tuacana nation, to which are united some 90 families of the Ixcani, occupies two towns on the banks of the river Brazos de Dios" (Mem. Hist. Tex., bk. II, MS.). This not improbable, for although the Yscanis are sometimes mentioned by name as late as 1794, at least, it is always in connection with the other Wichita tribes, and with no indication as to their location. After 1794, so far as has been learned, the name is not used. But a quarter of a century later, when the Tawakoni villages are again mentioned in the records (now English instead of Spanish), one of them appears as that of the Waco, a name formerly unknown in Texas, and not accounted for by migration. The Waco may have been the Yscanis under a new name. For other information, see Tawakoni, Tawehash, Waco, Wichita. (H. E. B.)

Yucca. The yucca was perhaps the most useful plant known to the Indians of its habitat, which included the Southern states, the Rocky mtn. region, and the Great Plains as far n. as the Dakotas.

Yucca gloriosa is a native of Virginia, and Y. filamentosa ranges southward from that state. It was the "silk grass" so often mentioned by early writers on Virginia. The tribes making most use of this plant are the Comanche, Apache, Navaho, Pueblos, Havasupai, Mohave, Pima, Papago, Maricopa, Walapai, Paiute, Panamint, and Diegueños. There are innumerable specimens of sandals, cordage, etc., from caves and cliff-houses showing the use of yucca by the ancient Southwestern tribes, and that the Southern tribes valued the fiber is indubitable. The fruit of Y. baccata and Y. glauca is used for food by the Zuñi, Navaho, Apache, and other tribes of New Mexico and Arizona, and the flowers of Y. filamentosa and Y. gloriosa were eaten by the Virginia Indians and tribes farther s. The roots were the only soap (amole) known to the Southwestern tribes, and the Pueblos especially use it for washing the hair, for which purpose it is a god-send in a territory where the water is generally alkaline. The Kiowa added the roots to a preparation used in tanning skins (see Skin-dressing). The Navaho made green dye from the chopped leaves of Y. baccata in conjunction with another plant, and the Zuñi used the juice extracted, by boiling, from the fruit of Y. glauca, in the manufacture and decoration of pottery. The dried flower stalk is an excellent material for fire-drills (Apache, Zuñi, cliff-dwellers). The Zuñi shredded the stalk, after boiling, to procure a strong, straight fiber, which they extracted with their teeth. Hairbrushes were made from coarse yucca fibers by many tribes of the extreme S. W., and the Pueblos used thin strips of the leaf as paint brushes in decorating pottery, masks, tablets, dolls, prayer-sticks, etc. In basketry the leaves and slender fibrous roots were extensively used for making trays, plates, bowls, and mats for household use and to shroud the dead. The most useful product of the yucca was its excellent fiber, which was used in straight bunches or twisted into cord for making nets, noose snares, bowstrings, sandals, cloth, and warp for rabbit-skin and feather robes, and for sewing and tying, the leaves or strips of them often being used in the natural state for the latter purpose. For twisting the fiber into cord the Papago had a simple device which was whirled in the hand. The net of the carrying frame (kihu) of the Pima and Papago is elaborately worked and resembles lace. Dried flower stalks of the yucca were carried in certain Zuñi ceremonies, and the leaves were used for simulating flagellation in an initiation rite by the Hopi and other Pueblos. (w. n.)

Yuchi ('situated yonder,' probably given by some Indians of the tribe in answer to the inquiry "Who are you?" or "Whence come you?"). A tribe co-extensive with the Uchean family (q. v.). Recent investigations point strongly to the conclusion that the Westo referred to by early Carolina explorers and settlers, and from whom Savannah r. was originally named, were the Yuchi. It is uncertain whether the Stono, whose name is sometimes coupled with the Westo, were related to them, or whether the two tribes have been confused on account of a similarity in designation. The early writers also state that the Westo were driven out of their country in 1681 by the Savannah (Shawnee), but this must mean only a part of them. Another name applied to at least the northernmost Yuchi was Hogologe. These different names have caused much confusion, and standard maps of the 18th century have Westos, Hogologees, and Yuchi (or Uchee) noted independently. It is probable, however, that all of these were Yuchi, representing, instead of separate tribes, a number of successive migrations of Yuchi from Savannah r. to the Chattahoochee—the Westo being those driven out by the Shawnee, the Hogologe those who emigrated with the Apalachicola after the Yamasee war, and the Yuchi those who changed their place of abode between 1729 legislature, and some members thought the Yuchi should receive no annuities, since they were slaves. The Yuchi were much attached to the ways and customs of their forefathers, and in 1813 they took sides with the Upper Creeks against the Government. Their towns were destroyed in consequence of this by the friendly Creeks. Hawkins (Sketch, 62, 1799) claims a better standard of morality for them than for many of the Creek towns, saying "these people are more civil and orderly than their neighbors, and their women are more chaste and the men better hunters. The men take part in the labors of the women, and are more constant in their attachment to their women than is usual among red people." In 1836 they removed with the Creeks to the present Oklahoma, where fewer than 500 now reside in the s. w. part of the Creek Nation. Part live among the Shawnee on the W.—the so-called Shawano Yuchi. Here they had a separate town body, with representatives in the Creek assembly, until the dissolution of the Creek Nation as such in 1906. They exhibit a tendency toward conservatism and pride. Their loosely-marked settlements were named as follows: Arkansaw River, Big Pond Town, Blackjack Town, Deep Fork Creek, Duck Creek Town, Intatchkalgi, Mount Pleasant, Ogeechee, Padshilaika, Polecat Creek, Red Fork, Silver Bluff, Snake Creek, Spring Garden Town, and Tokogalgi.

In material culture the Yuchi are typical of the agricultural hunting tribes of the s. e. Atlantic and Gulf coast area, living formerly in permanent villages surrounded by cultivated fields and always situated conveniently near some stream where fish abounded. Their houses were grouped about a square plot of ground, which was held as sacred, where religious ceremonies and social gatherings took place. The ordinary houses were of the common coast type, covered with bark or mats, but there was, besides, another more complex and permanent sort with sides plastered with clay. They were good potters, manufacturing various forms by the coiling process, nearly all, however, similar in shape to gourds, from which it is possible the forms were derived. Incised decorations occur only on or near the rim. Decorated effigy pipes of clay are still made, resembling closely some of those found in mounds in Georgia and the Carolinas. Basketry was made of cane and hickory splints, and the art was quite highly developed. Considerable wooden ware was also used. The original style of clothing has been supplanted for several generations by calico and trade goods made into shirts, outside hunting jackets, leggings, turban-like headgear, sashes, neckbands, garters, shoulder straps, and pouches, which are possibly survivals of older forms. Sashes, neckbands, leg-bands, hair pendants, pouches, and shoulder-bands are decorated with geometrical designs in bead embroidery representing animals and natural objects. Some of these designs are said to be worn in imitation of mythic characters and seem to be in a sense symbolical. An influence may have been exerted on Yuchi art by the prairie tribes since the removal to the W. Bows and arrows, clubs, and spears were their chief weapons. The blowgun was much in use in hunting. Dogs, too, were used in the chase, and hunting formulas were believed to affect the movements of the quarry. Fishing was commonly carried on by poisoning the stream with a species of tephrosia.

The political organization of the tribe, which has become more pronounced in type since its incorporation into the Creek Nation, is based on the town. This is made up of some 18 or 20 totemic, maternal, exogamic clans, the members of which trace their descent from the totem animal and have certain restrictions in regard to it. At an annual ceremony the clans perform propitiatory and reverential dances in honor of their totems.

The Yuchi clans are as follows, the names in parentheses being the simplified forms of those recorded by Gatschet: Sag^ē (Sagi), Bear; Dalá (Tala), Wolf; Wē^ēya^u (Weyon), Deer; Tāb^ēä (Tapa), Tortoise; Wē^ēta^u (Wetchon), Panther; Cad^ēanē (Shatane), Wildcat; Catienē (Shathiane), Fox; Godá (Huda), Wind; Cū (Shu), Fish; Cagā^u (Shakian), Beaver; Cūlanē (Shuhlanan), Otter; Djā^{ti}ē (Tchatchiun), Raccoon; Yūsa^u (Yussoih), Skunk; Wētsagowa^u (Wetsagua), Opossum; Cadjwanē, Rabbit; Cáva, Squirrel; Wē^ēta^u (Witchah), Turkey; Čā^{na} (Sha), Eagle; Ya^{ti}ē, Buzzard; Ca, Snake. Gatschet gives also the Senan (Bird), Tapatwa (Alligator), Tapi (Salt), To Sweet-potato), Yonh (Hickory-nut), and Yontuh (Acorn), but it is doubtful if these clans existed among the Yuchi. There is disagreement among native informants regarding the existence of the Eagle, Buzzard, and Snake clans above given.

The whole male population of the town, and of the tribe as well, is again subdivided into two other social classes, which have certain town offices and functions in the ceremonies inherent in them. These classes are chief and warrior, and inheritance in them is reckoned through the father without regard to clanship of the other sort. Property is handed down partly through father to son and partly from father to sister's children, inheritance being thus an individual and not solely a group matter. The men of different classes are distinguished by facial painting.

The town officials are a town chief and priest, chosen from the chief class of certain leading clans; a master of ceremonies and representative from the warrior class of certain clans, with 3 secondary chiefs and 3 secondary warriors from certain clans. There are, besides, other officials chosen from certain clans and classes, who have charge of different stages of the ceremonies. Unanimous acclamation constitutes appointment to an office. The town itself, represented by its chiefs and lesser officers or warriors, regulates the ceremonies and matters of an internal nature or those dealing with outsiders or other towns.

Each town has a sacred public square, or shrine, where social and religious meetings are held, on the four edges of which stand four ceremonial lodges covered with boughs. In these lodges the different clan groups have assigned places during public occasions. The square ground symbolizes the rainbow, where, in the sky-world, Sun, the mythical culture-hero, underwent the ceremonial ordeals which he handed down to the first Yuchi.

The chief power above that is recognized as the source of life and mystery is the Sun. There seems, as well, to be some unworshiped but acknowledged supernatural source of power from which mechanical magic flows. But the Sun, in his plural concept as chief of the sky-world, the author of the life, the ceremonies, and culture of the people, is by far the most important figure in their religious life. The various animals of the sky-world are important in myth, but in practice the Yuchi do not recognize in them anything more to be feared than in the numerous spirits which dominate other natural objects in their surroundings. Vegetation spirits are closely concerned in their daily and ceremonial life, as is shown in the annual new-fire and harvest ceremony. Besides these, totemic ancestral spirits play a rather important part.

Public religious worship is performed by the whole town in a complex annual ceremony connected with the corn harvest, the different rites of which occupy three days and the intervening nights. The square ground is the scene of action. Ceremonial making of new fire, clan dances mimicking totemic ancestors, dances propitiating evilly-inclined spirits and thanking various beneficent ones as well as inducing them to continue their benefits, scarification of the males for sacrifice and purification, taking an emetic as a purifier, the partaking of the first green corn of the season, and the performance of a characteristic ball game with two sticks, are the main elements of the annual ceremony. Young men are admitted to the ranks of manhood at this time. This important event is carried on in distinct emulation of the Sun to insure a continuance of tribal existence. The sentiment of obedience to the Sun is peculiarly prominent with the Yuchi.

Disease is accredited to the presence of a harmful spirit which has been placed in the system by some offended animal spirit or malevolent conjurer. Herbs, which have names corresponding in some way to the name of the animal causing the trouble, are brewed in a pot and administered internally. By this means of sympathetic healing and by the use of song formulas the disease spirit is driven out by the shaman.

During her catamenial periods, and at childbirth also, the woman secludes herself from her family and house. She lives alone in a temporary hut under a taboo of certain foods. At the birth of the child its navel cord is ceremonially disposed of, and the father is henceforth prohibited from association with his friends, besides having restrictions for a month against the use of certain foods, manual labor, and hunting. The children's cradle is the hammock. On the fourth day after its birth the child is named after a maternal granduncle or grandaunt. Unmarried girls are marked off from others with red paint. The marriage rite is a very simple one, the couple being of different clans, of course, merely agreeing to unite and for a while usually reside in the woman's home. The dead were formerly buried underneath the floor of the house with a supply of food and clothes. Nowadays, however, burial is made in a cemetery, with rites similar to those of former times, and a small log hut is raised over the spot. Here a fire is kept burning for four days, during which time the spirit is on its journey eastward to the land of the dead up above where the Sun is. There are four souls, but only one passes on to the future life, having as a finale to pass an obstacle at the entrance to the sky. If this point is passed in safety the journey is over, otherwise it returns to earth a menace to the happiness of the living.

In mythology there is a sharp contrast between culture-hero and trickster. In the more sacred cosmological myths considerable unity is found, but the trickster tales are loose and often fragmentary. Creations are ascribed mostly to the assembled pre-earthly animals. Earth is brought up from a watery waste by crawfish. The Sun seems to be connected in some way with the culture-hero. He created the Yuchi, having caused their forebears to spring from a drop of menstrual blood in the sky world, whence they were transferred to this earth. He is likewise the author of the human class and clan system and the religious rites, but he does not appear prominently as a transformer. He is furthermore the giver of all that is materially good and beneficial in their lives. The trickster, on the other hand, is named Rabbit. He effects a few transformations in the course of his mischief-making career, without any particular motive. Other myths are held by the various clans, and repeated generally in praise of their totem. Many myth elements from negro sources may have been embodied by these Indians in their animal tales, probably through contact with the Creek negroes. Other types of widely distributed myths are the race between two animal rivals, the imitation of the host, the magic flight, stealing of fire, tar-man story, the legend about an emigration of part of the tribe, the origin of death resulting from someone's mistake, and the explanation of various peculiarities possessed by the present-day animals. Yué. The name applied by the Garzas, who were living in 1828 at Mier, on the s. side of the Rio Grande, to the band of Carrizos who lived at Camargo. The band of Carrizos about Laredo, Texas, they called Yemé. Those at Camargo were at this time still in part unsettled and uncivilized. According to the naturalist Luis Berlandier, who visited these places in the year named, the Garzas were commonly known in the country as Carrizos, yet their languages were entirely distinct, the two tribes being able to understand each other only by signs. He adds that the language of the Yué was limited to the Carrizo tribe only (Berlandier and Chovel, Diario de Viage de Limites, 144, 146, 1850). (H. E. B.)

Yufera. A district (tribe) speaking a distinct dialect of the Timucuan language, mentioned without location or other detail by Pareja (1614), Arte de la Lengua Timuquana, 1886.

Yugeuingge (Tewa: 'village of the ravine'). A former Tewa pueblo on the w. bank of the Rio Grande, opposite the present pueblo of San Juan, near the site of the village of Chamita, N. N. Mex. It was visited in 1542 by Francisco de Barriónuevo, of Coronado's expedition, but little information concerning it was obtained, as the inhabitants at the approach of the Spaniards fled to the mountains, where, it was said, they had four strong villages that could not be reached with horses. The pueblo was voluntarily relinquished to the Spaniards under Oñate in 1598, the inhabitants joining their kindred at San Juan. In the year named the first white settlement in the W. was here made, under the name "San Francisco de los Españoles," and on Sept. 8 the chapel was consecrated. In the following year the name was changed to San Gabriel, which has been retained by the Mexicans as the name of the place to this day. San Gabriel was abandoned in the spring of 1605 and Santa Fé founded as the seat of the New Mexican provincial government. See Bandelier (1) in *Arch. Inst. Yuit (pl. of yuk, 'man': own name.—Bogoras). The Asiatic Eskimo, who emigrated from America probably at no distant period and are settled around East cape, in the neighborhood of Indian pt.

and C. Chukotsky, and on St Lawrence id. Although a few of them have obtained reindeer, in mode of life and general characteristics they resemble the Eskimo of Alaska. Their language, however, varies considerably from that spoken on the American side and is said to be harsher. But few of them have adopted the custom of wearing labrets. They have been frequently confused with their neighbors, the maritime Chukchi. Linguistically they may be distinguished into four groups—the Noökalit of East cape, the Aiwanat of Indian pt., the Wuteclit of C. Ulakhpen, and the Eiwhuelit of St Lawrence id. Their villages, grouped under these subdivisions, are: Noökalit: Enmitahin, Nabukak, Ulak. Aiwanat: Avak, Imtuk, Napakutak, Rirak, Tesik, Unisak. (Krause mentions another, at the head of Plover bay, called Nassakutlok, not referred to by Bogoras.) Wuteclit: Chenlin, Cherinak. Eiwhuelit: Chibukak, Chitnak, Kialegak, Kukuliak, Pugu-viliak, Punuk.

Yukian Family (adapted from Wintun Yuki, 'enemy'.—Kroeber). A linguistic family in N. California, comprising only the Yuki, divided into several tribes or groups speaking several dialects. Apparently they had no common name of their own. Though the territory of the Yuki was very small, it was divided into three detached areas—one about the present Round Valley res. and s. thereof; another w. of this, along the coast, and a third some distance to the s. in the mountains dividing Sonoma from Napa and Lake cos.

The greater part of the family was comprised within the area first mentioned, which ran along Eel r. from a short distance above the confluence of the North fork, along both sides of the river to the junction of South Eel and Middle fork, extending on the w. to the ridge E. of Long valley. From the junction of the two streams up, the Yuki possessed the entire drainage of Middle fork E. to the watershed of the Coast range, which formed the boundary between them and the Wintun. They appear to have lived also on Hull cr., which drains into the North fork of Eel r. Some of the chief divisions of the Yuki proper were the Ukomnom in and about Round valley, the Sukshultatanom on North fork of Middle fork, the Huititnom on South fork of Middle fork, the Sukanom on Middle fork, the Utinom about the junction of Middle fork and South Eel r., and the Lilshiknom and Tanom on main Eel r. South of this group of tribes, between the Middle fork and the South Eel, in Eden valley and the adjacent country, were the Witukomnom, whose dialect was somewhat different from that of the Yuki proper. South of the Witukomnom again, on both sides of South Eel r., certainly near the mouth of Tomki cr., and probably to the headwaters of the South Eel itself; also on the upper waters of Russian r., at the head of Potter valley, were the Huchnom, who spoke a third dialect, which differed considerably from the Yuki proper. They are known by the Pomo, who are their neighbors on the s., as Tatu, and by the whites as Redwoods.

The second territory held by Yukian tribes extended along the coast from Ten Mile r. to Rockport or Usal, and inland as far as Jackson Valley cr., or more probably the range between this stream and the sea. These people call themselves Ukoh-tontilka, 'Ocean tribe.' They have probably been separated from the main body of the Yuki by Athapascan migration, as the Kato of Cahto and Laytonville occupy a strip of Athapascan territory between the two divisions. The dialect of the coast Yuki does not differ more from that of the Yuki proper than does that of the Huchnom.

The third territory occupied by the Yuki is mainly in the hills between Geysers and Calistoga, but includes a small portion of Russian r. valley, about Healdsburg. These people are called Ashochimi by Powers, and are generally known as Wappo. They are separated from their northern relatives by Pomo tribes, and their language diverges greatly from all other Yuki dialects.

The Yuki are said to have been somewhat more warlike than most of the Californians. The Yuki proper, or portions of them, were at war at times with the Kato and Wailaki, the Wintun, the Huchnom, and certain Pomo tribes. Excepting the Wappo, who fought with the Spaniards in the second quarter of the 19th century, the Yuki were barely beginning to be known at the time when the discovery of gold flooded the state with Americans. They came in conflict with the whites on different occasions, suffering considerably in numbers as a consequence. Round Valley res. was established in the heart of their territory in 1864, and the greater part of the stock, as well as various Athapascan, Wintun, Pomo, and other tribes, were brought to it, where they still reside. The Yuki proper in 1902 numbered about a hundred, the Huchnom barely a dozen. The coast Yuki amount probably to 15 or 20 individuals, and the number of Wappo, though not accurately known, is undoubtedly also small.

The Yuki much resemble the Pomo in appearance. They are short, broad, and sometimes fat. Measurements give an average height for men of 162 cm., which is a rather low stature. The Yuki show a considerably longer headform than any of their northern, eastern, or southern neighbors, as the Yurok, Hupa, Wintun, Maidu, and Pomo. This deviation is unexplained. The women tattoo their faces, especially across the cheeks and on the chin.

In their mode of life, habits, and beliefs the Yuki generally resemble the better-known Pomo, though the Yuki proper show the closest specific cultural resemblances to the neighboring Athapaskan Wailaki. The Huchnom affiliated with the Pomo, and resembled these more nearly in their habits and practices than they did the Yuki proper. They fished and hunted, but most of their food was vegetal. They performed a ceremony conducted by a secret society whose members represented the spirits of the dead. They believed that the world was created by a being, human in shape, called Taikomol, 'He who travels alone,' assisted by the coyote. This deity was represented in a ceremony.

Yukonikhotana. An Athapaskan tribe in Alaska whose range is principally n. of the Yukon from the mouth of Tozi r. down to Yukon r. They are few in number and are less nomadic than their eastern neighbors. Beyond the uneventful visits of several explorers, nothing of their history is known. They trade every spring at Nuklukayet with the Kutchin tribes from upper Yukon and Tanana rs. They hunt the moose, reindeer, and fox, the skins of which they either trade or make into clothing, although of late years they are beginning to adopt the clothing of the whites. Their houses are less permanently built than those on the lower part of the Yukon. They have no draft dogs, like their western neighbors, but carry their burdens on their shoulders. There seems to be no system of totems among them, although Petroff (Rep. on Alaska, 161, 1884) states that there is evidence of their division into clans. Intermarriage with their lowland neighbors, to whom they are closely related dialectically, is rare; it is said that they do not purchase their wives, like many Athapaskan tribes, but take and divorce their wives at pleasure, there being no marriage ceremony among them. Although the men outnumber the women, polygyny is common among them. They are not copper-colored, but of an ashy olive hue, and are less hairy than the adjacent Eskimo. The dead are frequently buried in an erect position, the sarcophagus being of a rough casklike form. Many of their old customs have been modified or replaced by those of the Eskimo. The population of two villages in 1843 was 56 (Zagoskin quoted by Petroff in 10th Census, Alaska, 37, 1884). Petroff (ibid., 12) gives their total population in villages as 221. The villages are Chentansitzan, Medvednaia, Melozikakat, Noggai, Nowi, Tohnokalony, and Tuklukyet.

Yuma (Yahmāyo, 'son of the captain,' seemingly the title of the son of the hereditary chief, contracted and applied to the tribe through misunderstanding

Ofiate visited the locality in 1604-05, he found the 'Coahuanas' (Cuchan) in 9 rancherias on the Colorado, entirely below the mouth of the Gila. Physically the Yuma were a fine people, superior in this respect to most of their congeners. Though brave and not unwarlike they were in no sense nomadic, seldom leaving their own villages where, like the Mohave, they practised a rude agriculture, raising corn, beans, pumpkins, and melons. The Catholic fathers of the 18th century erroneously considered Yuma and Cuchan as separate and distinct groups, the former residing e. of the lower Colorado, and the latter w. of it. They divided the Yuma into several tribes: Alehedomas, Hudcodoadans, etc. Leroux, about 1853, estimated their number at 3,000. In 1910 there were 655 under the Ft Yuma school superintendent, Cal. For the so-called Apache Yuma, see Tulkepaia.

The following have been mentioned as Yuma tribes or bands and rancherias: Cerritos, Concepción, Gimiels, Pescadero, Posos, San Dionysio, San Pablo, San Pascual, San Pedro, Santa Isabel, Tinajas, Tutum.

Yumam. A former Maidu village on the site of Oroville, Butte co., Cal.—Dixon in Bull. Am. Mus. Nat. Hist., XVII, map, 1905.

Yuman Family. An important linguistic family whose tribes before being gathered on reservations occupied an extensive territory in the extreme s. w. portion of the United States and n. Lower California, including much of the valley of Colorado r., the lower valley of the Gila, and all of extreme s. California. The family was formerly supposed to include also the Seri of w. Sonora and Tiburon id. in the Gulf of California, but these have been determined to belong to a distinct stock (the Serian) bearing no linguistic relation to any of the tribes within the United States, while the tribes that occupied the s. half of Lower California, so far as can be judged from the meager linguistic evidence, belong to another family yet unnamed. These latter were distinguishable from the Yuman tribes as being probably the lowest in culture of any Indians of North America, for their inhospitable environment, which made them wanderers, was unfavorable to the foundation of government, even of the rude and unstable kind elsewhere found. The names of a large number of rancherias or villages have been preserved, and as many of these antedated mission rule, they indicate that their occupants had at least entered upon a rude social life and lived under some sort of recognized authority, though less definite and binding than among most other tribes. There are also the names of not a few of the divisions usually termed tribes, but the limits of country claimed by these and their interrelations are almost unknown. Father Baegert, who is perhaps the best authority on the Lower California Indians, gave five distinct languages, which represented as many divisions or groups of tribes. These were, from the north southward: Cochimi, Laimon (usually considered a branch of Cochimi), Waicuri, Uchiti (usually considered a branch of Waicuri), and Pericu. Of these, however, only the Cochimi can be definitely regarded as Yuman. Later authorities usually recognize but three linguistic divisions for Lower California, viz, Pericu, Waicuri (a distinct stock), and Cochimi, the last occupying the peninsula n. of about lat. 26°. This is a very unsatisfactory grouping, as it is improbable that a single language, the Cochimi, extended over 6 degrees of latitude; but it is the best that can be made in our present lack of knowledge, and the linguistic groups may be accepted as divisional names under which to group the numerous rancherias in which these now extinct tribes lived.

Passing from the s. to the n. end of the peninsula a marked change for the better was observed. The social groups appear to have been better defined; the tribes made fine basketry and pottery, and in many other ways were further advanced. They lived in communal huts, very well constructed of cottonwood and well thatched. No better example of the power of environment to better man's condition can be found than that shown as the lower Colorado is reached. Here are tribes of the same family, remarkable not only for their fine physical development, but living in settled villages with well-defined tribal lines, practising a rude but effective agriculture, and well advanced in many primitive Indian arts. The usual Indian staples were raised except tobacco, these tribes preferring a wild tobacco of their region to the cultivated. None of the Colorado r. tribes borrowed the art of irrigation from the Pueblo peoples, consequently their crops often suffered from drought. All of them depended more or less on the chase—the river tribes less, those of the interior more. Mezquite beans, piñon nuts, tornillas, and various seeds and roots were important articles of food. None of them were boatmen; in crossing rivers and transporting their goods they employed rude rafts, or balsas, made of bundles of reeds or twigs. Apparently all the river tribes cremated their dead, and with them all articles of personal property. The climate favored nudity, the men wearing only the breechcloth, and not always that, while women were content with a short petticoat made of strips of bark.

Regarding the character of the tribes of the Rio Colorado in the 18th century, Fray Francisco Garcés (Diary, 1775–76, 435, 1900) says: "The Indian men of its banks are well-formed, and the Indian women fat and healthy; the adornment of the men, as far as the Jamajabs [Mohave], is total nudity; that of the women is reduced to certain short and scanty

Most of the so-called wars of the Yurok were private feuds, participated in by villages. These took place as frequently between Yurok villages as against alien tribes. In all cases payment for the dead and for all property destroyed was made at the conclusion of peace. Apart from a few vessels that touched at Trinidad in the 18th century, and a few trappers that visited Klamath r., whites did not come into contact with them and were utterly unknown to them before 1850. After the coming of the Americans the Yurok never engaged in war with them as a body, though certain villages became involved in conflicts with the miners and early settlers. The lower 20 m. of Klamath r. were constituted into a reservation as early as 1855. Of recent years this has been discontinued, the few surviving Indians having allotments in severalty. The river above this former reservation, up to the mouth of the Trinity, forms at present a nominal part of the Hupa res. Actually the Government has interfered very little with the Yurok, who have always been entirely self-supporting. They now number 500 or 600 along Klamath r., those on the coast being very few. In 1870 the number on the river was said to be 2,700.

The Yurok are fairly tall for Pacific Coast Indians (168 cm.) and considerably above the average Californian in stature. Their cephalic index is .83, being the highest known from California. It is probable that they do not belong to the Californian type physically, but are a mixture of this with an Athapascan type. Their facial expression is different from that of their neighbors, the Karok and the Hupa, but they do not appear to differ much in their measured proportions from the Hupa. The men are less inclined to be stout than in the interior and in central California. Deformation of the head is not practised, but the women tattoo the chin.

The Yurok, together with several other tribes of n. w. California, especially the Karok and Hupa, formed a distinct ethnographic group, characterized among other things by the considerable influence which ideas of property exerted on social conditions and modes of life. There was no chieftainship, prominence depending altogether on the possession of wealth, to the acquisition of which all efforts were directed. The potlatch of the n. Pacific coast did not exist among them. Marriage was distinctly a property transaction. The medium of exchange consisted chiefly of dentalium shells, though woodpecker scalps and large worked pieces of obsidian were also regarded as valuables. The men wore no regular clothing, using skins as occasion required.

The women wore skirts of dressed skins or sometimes of bark, basketry caps, and, as there was need, cloaks of furs. Along the river acorns were much eaten, but salmon and lampreys made up a very large part of the food. Along the coast products of the sea were more important as food. The Yurok houses were from 18 to 25 ft square, built of split and dressed planks about a square or octagonal pit, with a gabled roof. Their canoes were less than 20 ft in length, square at both ends, made of redwood. They were particularly adapted for use on the rapid river, but were also used for going out to sea. The Yurok and neighboring tribes developed a number of specialized ceremonies, especially the Deerskin and the Jumping or Woodpecker dances. These were held only at certain localities and differed somewhat in each place.

The mythology of the Yurok is characterized by a well-developed conception of the Wage, a race largely responsible for the present condition of the world, who disappeared before the coming of men, and by myths centering about "Widower-across-the-sea" and other creators or culture-heroes. All the myths of the Yurok refer to the country which they now inhabit, most of them being very specifically localized. Historical traditions are lacking except for the most recent generations. Like all the tribes of n. w. California they were essentially unwarlike, engaging in war only for purposes of revenge. The most important contest that they remember took place in the first third of the 19th century between the village of Rekwoi and one of the Hupa villages, in the course of which both settlements were destroyed.

The Yurok were altogether without tribes or political divisions, other than the purely local ones of villages, and lacked totems. Their principal villages on the Klamath, in their order, from Bluff cr. down, were as follows: Atsepar, Loolego, the three villages Pekwuteu, Weitspus, and Ertlerger at the confluence of the Trinity with the Klamath, Wakhshak, Atsep, Kenek, Merip, Kepel, Shaa, Murek, Meta, Nakhtskum, Shregegon, Yokhter, Pekwan, Kootep, Wakhtek, Wakhker, Tekta, Serper, Enipeu, Ayotl, Erner, Turip, Wakhkel, Hoopou, and Wetlko and Rekwoi on opposite sides of the mouth of the river at Requa. On the coast, 6 m. n. of the mouth, was Amen; to the s. successively were Ashegen, Eshpeu, Arekw, Tsahpekw, Oketo and other villages on Big lagoon, and Taurau (Trinidad).

Zakhausiken (Zarrauzsi'ken, 'middle ridge' or 'middle hill'). A village of the Spences Bridge band of Ntlakyapamuk ½ m. back from Thompson r., on the s. side, about 31 m. above Lytton, Brit. Col.—Teit in Mem. Am. Mus. Nat. Hist., II, 173, 1900.

Zaltana ('mountain'). A Knaiakhotana clan of Cook inlet, Alaska.—Richardson, Arct. Exped., I, 407, 1851.

Zandzhulin ('village in a highland grove'). A Kansa settlement at Kaw agency, Ind. T., in 1882.

Zandjūliⁿ.—Dorsey, Kansa MS. vocab., B. A. E., 1882. Zündjūliⁿ.—Ibid.

Zape. A former Tepehuane pueblo, and seat of the mission of San Ignacio, at the extreme head of Nazas r., lat. 25° 30', lon. 106°, n. w. Durango, Mexico. There are a number of ancient burial caves in the vicinity, and 20 m. s. are the noted ruins usually known by this name (Lunholtz, Unknown Mex., I, 448, 1902).

S. Ignacio del Zape.—Orozco y Berra, Geog., 318, 1864.

Zassaleto. A former village, probably Salinan, connected with San Antonio mission, Monterey co., Cal.—Taylor in Cal. Farmer, Apr. 27, 1860.

Zdluiat. A Knaiakhotana village of 16 persons in 1880 on the e. side of Knik bay, at the head of Cook inlet, Alaska.—Petroff in 10th Census, Alaska, 29, 1884.

Zeawant. See Sewan.

Zhanichi ('wooden house'). A former village on Kansas r., Kan., occupied by that part of the Kansa tribe which followed the chief Nunpewaye, probably before 1820.

Jan-itci.—Dorsey, Kansa MS. vocab., B. A. E., 1882.

Zhawenikashika. The Beaver gens of the Quapaw.

Beaver gens.—Dorsey in 15th Rep. B. A. E., 229, 1897. Jawe'nikaciqa.—Ibid.

Zillgaw ('many mountains'). A subdivision of Apache in Arizona under the chiefs Eskiltiesillaw, Nogenogeys, and Nardososin, about 1875.—White, Apache Names of Ind. Tribes, MS., B. A. E.

Ziñogaba. Mentioned by the Mohave to Juan de Oñate in 1604 as a tribe of people, with bald heads, living on an island of the same name a day's journey by boat off the California coast. These Indians were said to wear necklaces and ear ornaments of pearl shells, called xicullo (shikul-yo), and to possess "an instrument with which they made the noise when they dance, which is a long stick from which are pendent many pieces of that metal [silver] of which they make dishes in which they eat." The tribe had an old "lady or captainess," called Cifñacohola, "the height of a-man-and-a-half," very broad, with big feet, who had a sister, also a giantess; there was no man of her kind, and she mingled with no one on the island. See Zárate Salmerón (ca. 1629) in Land of Sunshine, 106, Jan. 1900. Ziñogova.—Zárate Salmerón, op. cit., 108.

Zoar. A Moravian mission among the Suhinimiut Eskimo on the E. coast of Labrador, established in 1865.

Zoe (tzoí, 'wax,' 'pitch tree'.—Buelna). A tribe formerly inhabiting a small territory in lat. 27°, lon. 108°, about the Sinaloa-Chihuahua boundary, Mexico. According to a tradition mentioned by Ribas (Hist. Trium., 145, 1645) they came from the N. together with the Ahome, and although they had a different language and lived somewhat distant from each other, the two tribes preserved constant friendship. The Zoe established themselves on the slopes of the sierra, in a settlement of the same name at the sources of the Rio del Fuerte near the Sinaloa. On their conversion to Christianity the missionaries moved them to the other part of the river, founding a town which comprised the whole tribe. The Zoe and Baimena spoke their particular dialect, although they usually, in communication with others, made use of the Cahita and to some extent also the Nahuatl. They are extinct. (F. W. H.)

Chóis.—Hardy, Trav., 438, 1829 (referred to as a Mayo town). Choiz.—Rivera, Diario, leg. 1514, 1736. Troes.—Orozco y Berra, Geog., 333, 1864. Tzoes.—Ibid. Zoe.—Ibid.

Zogliakten. A Koyukukhotana village of 7 persons in 1844 on the E. bank of Koyukuk r., Alaska.

Tsogliakhten.—Zagoskin quoted by Petroff in 10th Census, Alaska, 37, 1884. Tsogliakten.—Tikhmenief (1861) quoted by Baker, Geog. Dict. Alaska, 1902. Zogliakten.—Zagoskin in Nouv. Ann. Voy., 5th s., XXI, map, 1850.

Zoht. A village of the Nicola band of Ntlakyapamuk living near the W. end of Nicola lake, 50 m. above Spences Bridge, Brit. Col. Pop. 31 in 1901, the last time the name appears.

Nicola.—Brit. Col. map, Ind. Aff., Victoria, 1872 (one of two villages so named on Nicola lake may correspond to this town). Yoht.—Can. Ind. Aff., 277, 1891. Yon-kt.—Ibid., 198, 1885. Zoht.—Ibid.,

Zuaque (suua, 'interior,' 'middle'; yaqui, 'river': 'river of the middle,' referring to the Rio Fuerte, of which Zuaque is the ancient name.—Buelna). A subdivision of the Cahita, speaking both the Tehueco and the Vacoregue dialect and occupying a territory extending 10 leagues along the middle waters of Rio del Fuerte in N. Sinaloa, Mexico. They occupied the pueblos of Mochicaui and San Miguel Zuaque, besides another the name of which is unknown. They did not take kindly to the Jesuit missionaries established in their country at the beginning of the 17th century, exhibiting a "threatening indifference" to their salvation. In 1601 Gov. Hurtaide, with the aid of the Guazave, invaded their country and by a ruse captured and hanged about 40 leading men.

Zumblito. A former village, probably Salinan, connected with San Antonio mission, Monterey co., Cal.—Taylor in Cal. Farmer, Apr. 27, 1860.

Zuñi. The popular name of a Pueblo tribe, constituting the Zuñian linguistic family, residing in a single permanent pueblo known by the same name, on the n. bank of upper Zuñi r., Valencia co., N. Mex. (for illustration see Pueblos), and, in summer, the three neighboring farming villages of Pescado, Nutria, and Ojo Caliente. Their tribal name is A'shiwi (sing. Shi'wi), 'the flesh.' The name of their tribal range is Shi'wona, or Shi'winakwin, which Cushing renders 'the land that produces flesh.' Their common name, Zuñi, is a Spanish adaptation of the Keresan Sūnyūtsi, or Sū'nyūtsi, of unknown meaning. It has no connection with "people of long finger-nails," as has been erroneously said.

According to Cushing, the Zuñi are descended from two parental stocks, one of a companion of Alvar Nufiez Cabeza de Vaca on his famous journey from the Gulf of Mexico across Texas and into Mexico), to explore the unknown region to the n. w. Sending the negro and some Indian guides ahead to prepare the tribes for his coming and to report on the prospects of the country, the friar pursued his way through Sonora and into the present Arizona, where he received word from some of the Indians who had accompanied Estevanico that the negro and some of their own people had been killed by the natives of Cibola. After placating his Indian followers, who threatened his life, Fray Marcos again pressed on, viewing the first of the Cibola villages from an adjacent height. He then started which came originally from the n., the other from the w. or s. w., from the country of the lower Rio Colorado. The latter, who resembled the Yuman and Piman tribes in mode of life, joined the others after their settlement in the Zuñi valley. To this nucleus there were many accretions from other tribes and stocks, as well as many desertions from it, in both prehistoric and historic times.

Although indefinite knowledge of an Indian province containing seven cities in the far n. existed in Mexico soon after the conquest, the first real information regarding the Zuñi tribe and their 7 pueblos was gained by Fray Marcos of Niza, who in 1539 set out, with a Barbary negro named Estevanico (who had been on his return to Mexico, where he made a report of his discoveries, representing the "Kingdom of Cibola," from what he had heard from the Indians along the route, as a rich and populous province containing 7 cities, of which Ahamas (Hawikuh) was the principal one. His glowing accounts led to the fitting out of an expedition the next year, 1540, under Francisco Vasquez Coronado, the advance guard of which, after crossing the arid region to the s., met the first party of the Zuñi near the mouth of the river of the same name. The first meeting was friendly, but a collision soon occurred, and after a sharp skirmish the Indians retreated to their villages. Continuing their advance, the Spaniards approached the town described by Fray Marcos under the name of Cibola, but which Coronado called Granada. This was Hawikuh. After a contest outside the walls the place was carried by storm, July 7, 1540, when it was found that the warriors had previously removed the greater part of their property, together with their women and children, to their stronghold on Taaialone mesa, whither they also fled. The magnificent Kingdom of Cibola, with its 7 cities filled with gold and precious stones, proved to be only a group of ordinary Indian pueblos, and the disappointed Coronado was moved to declare in his official report that the friar had "said the truth in nothing that he reported." Coronado found the 7 towns all within 4 leagues, each having a distinct name, and the largest containing 500 houses, while Cibola (derived from Shiwona, above mentioned), was found to be the name of the whole territory. From Cibola, on the identification of which with the Zuñi country all scientific students agree, expeditions were sent to Tusayan (the Hopi country), the Grand canyon of the Colorado, and to the Rio Grande and beyond, and after the arrival of the main force the Spaniards moved to the latter stream, there to enter winter quarters.

In 1580 the tribe was visited by Francisco Sanchez Chamuscado, in the account of whose journey the name of the province is printed Cami (Cufi). It was reported to contain 6 villages. In 1583 the province was visited by Antonio de Espejo, who for the first time called the place Zuñi, adding that its other name was Cibola, and who found there some Mexican Indians who had been left by Coronado. Espejo attributed to Zuñi the greatly exaggerated population of 20,000 in 6 villages (one of which was Aquico = Hawikuh = Coronado's Granada), thus indicating that one of their pueblos had been abandoned between 1540 and 1583. Zuñi was again visited by Juan de Oñate, the colonizer of New Mexico, in 1598, when this and several other pueblo provinces were given under the ministerial care of Fray Andrés Corchado, but there was no resident missionary at Zuñi at this time. In 1598 the Zuñi still occupied 6 villages, recorded by Oñate as: Aguicobi or Agucabi (Hawikuh), Canali (Kianawe?), Coaqueria (Kiakima), Halonagu (Halona), Macaqui (Matsaki), and Aquinsa (Apinawa?). The ruins of those that are identified beyond doubt are still plainly to be seen.

The first Zuñi mission was established at Hawikuh by the Franciscans in the summer of 1629. Fray Roque de Figueroa, Fray Agustin de Cuellar, and Fray Francisco de Madre de Dios being its missionaries, although one or two of these probably were established at Halona. Between this date and 1632 Fray Francisco Letrado was transferred from the Jumano, in N. New Mexico, to the Zuñi, but was murdered by them on Feb. 22 of the latter year, and 5 days later Fray Martin de Arvide, who had passed through Hawikuh on his way to the Zipsas, was killed by 5 Zuñi and a mestizo who accompanied him. As in Coronado's time, the Indians again fled to their stronghold on Taaialone mesa, where they remained until 1635. From this time until 1670 the history of the Zuñi is almost a blank. On Aug. 7 of the year named the Apache or Navaho raided Hawikuh, killed its missionary, Fray Pedro de Avila y Ayala, and burned the church, his remains being recovered the next day by Fray Juan Gualdo, priest at Halona. Hawikuh was never reestablished as a mission, and it is even possible that it was not reoccupied at all, Ojo Caliente springing up, a short distance away, as a summer farming settlement.

At the time of the great Pueblo rebellion of 1680 the Zuñi occupied but 3 towns, excluding Hawikuh. These were Halona, Matsaki, and Kiakima; the first at the site of the present Zuñi, on both sides of the river; the other two, which were

BIBLIOGRAPHY

NOTE.—The names of authors and the titles of their papers appearing in magazines and other serial publications are not separately given in this list of works, unless the paper referred to is cited by title in the body of the Handbook. For example, Dr A. L. Kroeber's memoir on The Yokuts Language of South Central California, published as Volume V, part 2, of the University of California Publications in American Archaeology and Ethnology, is referred to by the entry "Kroeber in Univ. Cal. Pub., Am. Arch. and Eth., v, pt. 2, 1907," consequently it is included in this list only under the caption University of California. Many manuscripts in the archives of the Bureau of American Ethnology have been consulted in the preparation of the Handbook, but as they are not readily accessible to students outside of Washington they are not included in this list.
